The shrinkage of assets in this country has been tremendous. Mr. Parker Willis suggested that our national wealth was $400,000,000,000 two years ago. To-day its market value is not more than $200,000,000,000. The securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange have shrunk from $136,000,000,000 on September 1, 1929, to $46,000,000,000 to-day, a shrinkage of $90,000,000,000, which is one and one-half times the amount of all the assets in all the banks of the United States. This is the extent to which the people's purchasing power has gone down, and the only thing that will ever help us meet our obligations is to inflate commodity values and purchasing power back to a point where it has some reasonable comparison with the obligations we made when we contracted to pay bonds and to meet notes and other fixed obligations two or three years ago. But I will discuss these questions more at length shortly. We are providing in this bill $100,000,000 to be used by the Federal Land Bank so they can meet their bond and interest obligations without having to sell the homes of our farmers who can not possibly pay their loan installments. We must save the farms in the crisis through which we are passing.

Regardless of what issues may be proposed for the consideration of this Congress, nothing can divert its attention from a program of legislation looking forward for some degree of financial relief from distressing conditions that have affected every person and every business. During the past two years the entire world has suffered from the greatest collapse in values which it has known since the Napoleonic wars. When we shall have passed through this awful depression and have reached better times, we shall describe this period as having been the most dismal in the mercantile, investment, and financial history ever known. We will look back and recount how trade and industry were stricken and prostrated as never before; how business activities in every land dwindled almost to the point of absolute stoppage; how the security markets reached a condition of true collapse; and how the farmer passed through a period of extreme distress because of the shrinkage in the market values of his products. We will recount how the largest and wealthiest business institutions in normal times, such as the great steel and copper industries, the great telegraph and carrier systems, as well as the others, reached the point where their very solvency was threatened; how failures of banks, large and small, were spread throughout the country, so numerous as to become appalling; and how every type and character of business were so affected that they were discontinued and millions of workers were turned out of employment to walk the streets, beg for work which could not be found, and how their families, in destitution, hungry, and suffering, were cared for by public charity. Indeed, we will look back on this day and time as one filled with horror.

This condition has been brought about, undoubtedly, by many causes working together, no one of which would have been sufficient, taken by itself, to account for so severe a depression.

In order to understand something of the time in which we find ourselves and the causes and conditions that have worked together to bring about the unusual situation, it is necessary for us to take a survey, to some degree, of the field and the causes responsible. A satisfactory explanation can not be offered until we have examined the causes. In the early part of 1929, apparent prosperity was in evidence on every hand. All property was advancing in value. Stocks, bonds, and securities were selling at fabulous prices. We were told that the sunshine of prosperity was about us, and that was the condition of the business mind everywhere.

Wealth is a somewhat varying term. It must be considered in relation to physical properties and the general desire by those who have the means to own and possess them. The peak of wealth in the United States was reached in 1920, when it was placed at $494,000,000,000. By 1929 this wealth had dropped to $373,000,000,000, and to $340,000,000,000 in 1930. Mr. H. Parker Willis in his recent book estimated that the wealth of the Nation was $410,000,000,000 and that about 37 per cent, or $150,000,000,000, of the national wealth of the United States is represented by securities. The New York Stock Exchange reports that on September 1, 1929, the total market value of all stocks and bonds listed on that exchange reached the amazing figure of $136,409,000,000. A large portion of these were of foreign origin. In 1920 the value of farm properties was placed at $78,000,000. I might recount every type and kind of property for the purpose of showing a comparison between its value then and now, and a similar result would be obtained. There is no way of telling the market value of the national wealth of to-day. Some have estimated that it is as low as 40 per cent of what it was in 1929. But we can very definitely determine the market value of the securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange. From $136,000,000,000 in 1929 they have dropped to not more than $46,000,000,000 to-day, a clear loss in market value of $90,000,000,000.

After the deflation and depression period of 1921 had subsided, this country was launched into a period of commercial inflation such as had never been known before. The method of salesmanship practiced by the Federal Government in placing the Liberty loan bonds and other Government securities in the hands of people were adopted by the larger commercial organizations and banking institutions as a security-selling plan. These methods were applied in whole or in part from the largest automobile manufacturers down to the smallest type of business institution. Partial-payment plans were devised to suit every commodity and every class of trade. We were taught that nothing need be paid for in full; that we should buy by making partial payments on our purchases from the most trivial commodity to the most expensive investment. This was a new scheme whereby the purchaser could make his funds extend further and gather unto himself a greater number of the things desired without the necessity for immediate concern about the full payment of the purchase price.

INDUSTRIAL INFLATION

This also became the age of overindustrial extension; businesses were established, factories built, enterprises launched by crafty and designing persons who were interested only in the development of the project, the flotation of its bonds and securities, and the sale of them through some underwriting syndicate or security affiliate to the public. Many of these industrial projects never had the slightest possibility of being able to earn dividends on the investment. Their securities and "promises to pay" had been issued and sold by the millions through high-powered underwriting syndicates to the public.

Expensive building projects were constructed in every large city and on these were placed first, second, and third mortgages, securing "gold bonds," which bonds were sold to the public in exchange for life-savings. The public, in turn, saw those savings wiped out by a foreclosure of a trust deed on a first mortgage, and often the first-mortgage holders found the forced-sale price was not sufficient to repay even the notes they held. It is interesting to turn to more authentic sources for information regarding the rapidity of the development of listable securities covering a portion of the recent industrial inflation.

On January 1, 1926, there was listed on the New York Stock Exchange "listable shares" to the number of 491,615,837, of a total value of $27,072,000,000. When the stock-market crash came in September, 1929, shares listed on the New York Stock Exchange amounted to 1,127,682,468, an increase in three and a half years of 636,000,000 shares, or more than 115 per cent.

MARKET VALUE OF SECURITIES

On January 1, 1925, the total market value of all stocks and bonds listed on the New York Stock Exchange was $60,684,000,000. With industrial inflation a rapid increase of these listings began about that time. In 1926 their market value was $70,000,000,000; in 1927, $75,500,000,000; in 1928, $86,500,000,000. January 1, 1929, they were $115,000,000,000, and nine months later, September 1, 1929, when the market price reached its peak, they were $136,409,000,000, an increase within four and two-thirds years from $60,884,000,000 to $136,409,000,000, a clear increase of $75,525,000,000, or 125 per cent for the original shares and bonds and those that had been added to the listings during that time.

SECURITIES AGENTS

This is the measure of the amount of savings, investments, property, and obligations that had been paid or assumed by the purchasers of securities. So well had the field of investment been worked that every nook and corner of the country had become interested in stocks, bonds, and investments. In every one of the 25,000 banks in the United States was to be found lists of stocks and bonds recommended by the metropolitan banks as splendid investment securities. Small banks were urged to sell stocks and bonds to customers who might have money on deposit. Thousands of agents selling stocks and bonds daily plied their trade on streets, or from door to door and from office to office, soliciting purchases and urging people to part with their savings for what was described as gilt-edge, high-interest-bearing securities. The security vendor was in evidence everywhere. It is believed that at the time the stock-market crash came in 1929 that as many as 20,000,000 people, or one out of every five in the United States, had become a buyer and seller of securities. Almost in every instance securities were traded in on margin, or, if bought outright, were placed with banks as security for loans with which to meet the purchase price. The entire country had assumed tremendous obligations, scarcely any property was clear of some mortgage, partial-payment balance, or marginal obligation, the holder of title having only a claim to whatever equity there might be above the indebtedness. It may be noted that a portion of the $136,000,000,000 at which securities were selling on the New York Stock Exchange when the stock-market crash came was paper profits, or appreciation in the hands of the original holders. That was no doubt true in some instances, but for the most part people who had accumulated some wealth or had savings accounts at low rates of interest converted these into stocks and bonds at the high prices prevailing during the spring and summer of 1929. To-day all the stocks and bonds listed on the New York Stock Exchange do not have a market value of more than $46,000,000,000. If the market continues to decline, it will soon be much less. This is a loss of $90,000,000,000 from the peak of prices, an average amount equal to $750 for each man, woman, and child in the United States.

This amount is equal to five times our national debt, seven times the bonded war debt due our country, almost four times as much as the amount of the war debt and the loans made by our private bankers to foreign countries; eight times the value of all the gold in the world; two-thirds the ad valorem assessment of all the property in the United States, and an amount equal to two years' national income. And this is the basic cause of the financial depression in which we now find ourselves engulfed.

THE NATIONAL ANNUAL INCOME

The annual national income of the United States for 1928 and 1929, that is, the amount of income earned in each of those years by all the people, amounted to about $90,000,000,000. The national income for 1931 undoubtedly will be less than $50,000,000,000, a reduction in round figures of $40,000,000,000, equal to an average amount of $400 for every man, woman, and child. This loss of annual income has fallen principally on those who labor for their daily bread and who were dependent on their employment for funds to feed and clothe their families. The calamity has been so great that if everyone of the 25,000 banking institutions in this country, with their $60,000,000,000 resources, had closed their doors, and if every dollar of those resources had been destroyed in toto, the loss would still be $30,000,000,000 less than the depreciation in the market value in stocks and bonds borne by the people during the last two years. Of course, the difference in destroying market value of listed shares and securities and in destroying all the banks and their assets would be that with the bank assets would go the credit machinery of the country, while the destruction of security values would carry with it no such consequence to the credit machinery, but the loss is visited upon individuals from the smallest to the greatest.

BANKING

Banking in former times was an entirely different business from what it is now and was conducted by entirely different rules. It involved no such wild-eyed schemes of get-rich-quick organizations as we find attached to every big banking institution to-day. One of the principal arguments urged by the big banking fraternity by its members who appeared before the House Committee on Banking and Currency last year against the smaller banks—and any bank with less than a capital of $250,000 was classed by them as a small bank—was that the small bank could not have the advantage of operating its security affiliate, its stock-trading department, and of employing its expert adviser on investments.

INFLATION BEGINS

Beginning about 1925 the biggest banks of the country combined with other banks to make still more monstrous banking institutions. Of the $60,000,000,000 assets of the 25,000 banks in this country, it was announced in May, 1930, that 12 banks owned $20,000,000,000 of those bank assets and credits. About the same time it was also stated by Mr. James W. Gerard, former United States ambassador to Germany, that 59 financial lords "ruled the United States." Mr. Gerard was close to Wall Street and was able to pick men who really ran the financial, industrial, and political shows of this country. He first gives a list of 15 men whom he classes as being outstanding figures in finance, the real kings among them all, and while he places John D. Rockefeller, jr., as No. 1, strange to say No. 2 is that great commoner and lover of the common people, Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. Then come "steel barons," "railroad magnates," "bosses of the wires," and "moguls of the newspaper world."

INFLATION METHODS

I want to be more specific regarding the methods used by the gigantic banking houses to reach the resources of the country and siphon out the savings out of every city, town, and hamlet in the land.

All down through the ages, until recent years, mankind was able to make a saving of its surplus capital only in the form of concrete tangibles, such as lands, houses, food, cattle, jewels, and gold and silver. All such forms of savings are now represented by stocks, bonds, life insurance, bank accounts, and so forth, which are a development of modern times. In the United States and other nations with modern financial set-ups a large part of the people use banks and no longer continue their habit of hoarding property and hard money, as in other times. We have, by legislation, enacted so many schemes for supplying credit that it makes it easy, I might say, inviting, for mortgages and other currency-raising instruments to be fastened upon our tangible property, so that there is practically nothing owned or desired by man but what can be readily converted into liquid assets. Perhaps this is an evil in our system. This is the general condition of property to-day, and this makes it all the more easy for the dealer in stocks and securities to reach the savings of the masses.

WATERED STOCKS

Watered stocks have played no little part in despoiling values in the past. When the elder Morgan put together an array of corporations to form the United States Steel Corporation, he headed a syndicate which underwrote the new securities sold by it to the public. For this service the syndicate received the sum of $62,500,000 in cash. Mr. Morgan's firm alone received $12,500,000 of this. Mr. Brandeis, now Supreme Court justice, quoted Herbert Knox Smith, commissioner of corporations, who said:

More than $150,000,000 of the stock of the United States Steel Corporation was issued directly or indirectly for mere promotion or underwriting services.

The Pujo committee investigation of the House of Representatives disclosed the fact that through very small investments in common stocks the Morgan firm had gotten control of the funds of three large insurance companies and 38 banks and trust companies, with total resources of $3,000,000,000. Dillon, Read & Co. received a fee of $15,000,000 for reorganizing Dodge Bros. a few years ago. Hundreds of other like instances could be pointed out, calling attention to stock-watering operations practiced by promoting and investment banking concerns. On April 15, 1930, during the hearings had by the House Committee on Banking and Currency, Mr. E. W. Decker, president of the Norwest Bancorporation, Minneapolis, Minn., described one of the stock-issuing performances of his corporation. He told us how the Bancorporation had been authorized to issue $300,000,000 of its stocks, how only $80,000,000 had been subscribed for and issued, leaving an authority to issue $220,000,000 additional stocks whenever the directors of this bank holding company deemed it advisable. He told us how 144,000 shares of its stock, then selling at 85 on the market, were offered to the shareholders at $72.50 per share. He said:

However, before that stock was offered to the shareholders, I had it underwritten, I think, by 75 different houses scattered all over the country, who were invited to join in the underwriting (syndicate) at $70 a share, because I thought it was good business.

He tells us how later the stock of the Norwest Bancorporation dropped in the market from $85 to $50 a share. Then, he said, he called upon the underwriting syndicate to pay into the treasury of the Norwest Bancorporation the difference between $70 and $50 a share on the 144,000 shares it had underwritten, which could not be sold to the public or to the original shareholders by the syndicate, because of the drop in price. I then asked Mr. Decker (Hearings, p. 874):

The way things turned out, your organization made $3,000,000 on that adventure, between the price at which it proposed to repossess them (the 144,000 shares) and that at which the stock was sold to the syndicate?

Mr. Decker, in a nonchalant manner, replied: "We added $2,800,000 to our surplus." I said:

You outguess the other fellow?
Mr. DECKER. We thought we did a good piece of merchandising.

And then the record shows "laughter."

Mr. BUSBY. That is the situation all over the country with banks that have large banking organizations and that have these subsidiaries?
Mr. DECKER. Yes, sir.
Mr. BUSBY. They are engaged largely in the merchandising or guessing game as to which one is going to get the better of the securities operation when it is finally sold out?
Mr. DECKER. Yes, sir.
Mr. BUSBY. Do you not think that that situation has largely inflated bonds and stocks on the markets of the country?
Mr. DECKER. Undoubtedly.

I then asked Mr. Decker:

Do you not think that the credits required by the business of the country are much less than the amount of credits that has been extended by operations just described and by bank loans and call loans?

Mr. Decker replied:

At the inflated period, prior to the crash, yes; to-day, no.

This big Norwest banker little dreamed at that time that we were just entering the period of business stagnation which we find on every hand to-day. I might tell you that this same Mr. Decker is one of the 12 men recently appointed by President Hoover to head the proposed $500,000,000 national credit corporation.

BANK OF ITALY

Perhaps the most extensive holding company that has operated in this country was the Transamerica Corporation, organized in October, 1928, for the purpose of taking over the Bank of Italy properties and for the further purpose of establishing, literally, a department store for operations in big financial transactions. It has the authorized capitalization of 50,000,000 shares, 23,000,000 of which had been issued by May 7, 1930, the day that Mr. Bacigalupi appeared before our committee. This holding company owned all of the stock of many national banks, practically all of the stock of two Federal joint-stock land banks. It owned and operated insurance companies, real estate, banking, in fact, almost all forms of credit institutions, to the number of 525. It owned security affiliates, stock trading and investment companies, and was interested as a stockholder in many kinds of big business. It bought 7 per cent of the stock of General Foods. It owned 300 State banks and branches in California. Its stocks were owned in every part of the world, in 40 foreign countries. It had banks in Italy and other European countries and had representatives and agents throughout the world. When Mr. Bacigalupi was before the Banking and Currency Committee, I called his attention to the wide scope of operations, commonly termed "department-store banking," in which the Transamerica Corporation was engaged, and then asked Mr. Bacigalupi if he could foretell the extent to which the operations of this company would reach. He replied—

I have already stated, Mr. Busby, that we are in the business, and we intend to continue in the legitimate pursuit of it; yes, sir.

He told us that day that the assets of the Transamerica were worth $1,176,000,000. At that time its shares were selling for $45 on the market. To-day their market value stands at about $2.50, a clear loss of $1,120,000,000, or 95 per cent of their market value within one and a half years. This was a great dream by big bankers who thought they could harness the resources of the world through artificially constructed and uneconomic arrangements to control the credits of this Nation as well as, in part, of the world. Friends had faith in the project, invested and lost millions. California, the home of the Bank of Italy, with its 300 branches and other allied financial institutions, has indeed been a great sufferer because of the collapse of this gigantic financial bubble.

Other like instances could be added in great numbers to these, but what I have called attention to illustrate the course taken to develop industrial credits and operate a type of financial trickery, legitimate, it is true, under our present banking laws, but wholly demoralizing in effect on well-meaning legitimate business. Great combinations in public utilities, steel ownership, copper, foods, milk, tobacco, railroads, chain stores, mail-order houses, power, and in every other financial activity became the order of the day. Forming holding companies to own, operate, and control big business was the method used to flood the country with stocks and bonds. How did all this affect the country district, the small merchant, and the rural bank? By reason of high interest rates paid for money in New York loaned to traders on the stock exchange, banks from the other parts of the country kept large sums on deposit and loan in New York. The smaller banks were advised by their big brothers in the city to "keep their assets liquid" by investing the funds of the people on deposit in large amounts in securities recommended by the security affiliate of the metropolitan bank. A favorite form of security even recommended to the small bank for purchase were the bonds of South American countries and of other small countries, which bonds usually carry a promise to pay an unreasonable rate of interest, and which bonds, when the truth was known, were found to have been underwritten at from two-thirds to three-fourths their par value by the security affiliate recommending them. In this way, time deposits and other savings in the most remote banks were reached, for the smaller banker in turn was induced to recommend for "investment" purposes the purchase of these bonds by its customer. The small bank knew who had available funds, because they were already in the hands of the bank as deposits. By selling these bonds to its customer the rural bank secured also a small rake-off or commission for passing the bonds through its hands to the people. So, through this process, the security affiliates of the large banking houses siphoned the stored up and hoarded credits and savings out of every city and hamlet in the country. They believed they were doing "a good piece of merchandising" when they exchanged through this process almost worthless paper for the life savings of the people. They were but building a house of cards which was to fall upon their heads later.

The rich were laying deep plans, as they were permitted to do under our banking laws and the credit machinery of the country, for the destruction, first, of the outlying districts, then the larger centers, and ultimately, to a great extent, their own well-being. The large banking fraternity of this country, with its security affiliate operations, forcing through high-powered salesmanship methods the overindustrial development during the past five years, and by the described method of gathering up the savings and withdrawing assets out of business everywhere, has been the direct cause of the failures of most of the country banks which have gone down during the last few years. The New York Stock Exchange and the other exchanges have received great blame for the collapse of business. The methods used in trading on these are partly to blame, but for the most part the stock exchange has been simply the vehicle through which the institutions that control the credit of the country have operated to bring about the ends they sought to accomplish. When the stock-market crash came in October, 1929, it was simply a sound of alarm to the world that American and international banking barons had accomplished the ruin of the world, and our country in particular, by their methods of manipulating and dealing in credits. Factories began to shut down, business curtailed expenses, labor was turned out of employment. As this increased, people ceased to consume, because they had not the means with which to purchase. Then we began to hear of an overproduction of this and that; then other business activities slowed up and other mills and factories reduced forces or suspended operations. This in turn deprived more people of employment, and that further curtailed their purchasing power. This process has continued for two years, until almost 10,000,000 persons, able, willing, and anxious to work, to earn the comforts and necessities of life, are without jobs and without means with which to keep themselves and their families from hunger and want. The sources at which wealth is produced have dried up.

Economists tell us that only from the mine, the farm, and by labor is wealth produced. When these were stopped the communities in which they were found were first affected. The local merchant, business institution, and bank were next affected. Then the larger operators on down the stream, and finally the instigators of this awful plot have felt the evil sown by themselves to the financial world return on their own heads. The big banking fraternity in America and the international banks find themselves face to face with great losses. They have loaned heavily to European, South American, and other countries, and now have little hope of making immediate collection. These bankers are, of course, interested in a moratorium on debts due our Government or the people; they are in favor of and have been urging a cancellation of our war debt. Why? Because whatever assets these bankrupt creditors may possess could then be applied to the exorbitant claims of international bankers. I do not desire to discuss this phase of our trouble, for I have not the time to go into it now. But to return to the original thought: What was believed to be beyond question gilt-edge securities, infallible in value, and continuous in dividend possibilities, were relied on heavily by the big banking institutions. I call your attention to one such corporation—General Motors. Its stock sold at a high of 91¾ in 1929. At that rate, its 43,500,000 shares would bring $3,991,125,000. That same stock sold this week at $21 a share. At that rate, all the shares would be worth $913,500,000, a net loss in market value of $3,077,626,000, or 77 per cent. Perhaps a more notable example of one of the favorites in big financial circles is United States Steel. It reached a high of 261¾ on September 3, 1929. At this market value, its 8,000,000 shares would be worth $2,094,000,000. To-day it is under $40 a share, and the total market value of these same shares is less than $320,000,000, a total loss of $1,770,000,000, or 85 per cent of its high market value. I have already called your attention to the collapse of the great world-wide holding corporation—Transamerica—which a year and a half ago claimed to be worth $1,176,000,000, but the market value of which to-day is not more than $60,000,000, a net loss of about $1,115,000,000, or 95 per cent.

So the uneconomic structure builded by the big credit institutions not only robbed and ruined many small holders of wealth, many who had but meager savings, but in the end they have done themselves no good. So I say again that, while our condition has been brought about undoubtedly by a conflux of causes, no one of which would have been sufficient, taken by itself, to account for severe depression, the prime offender, the one thing that has contributed most to this, has been the hand at the throttle of the credit machinery while driving to financial destruction.

As I have stated, one of our foremost banking economists, Mr. N. Parker Willis, placed our national wealth at $410,000,000,000 in 1929. Thirty-seven per cent of this was represented by stocks and bonds listed on the New York Stock Exchange. If the market value of these—$136,000,000,000—has depreciated to $46,000,000,000 or less, the other 63 per cent of our national wealth represented by more tangible things than securities has surely greatly depreciated also. In 1920 farm properties were valued at $78,000,000,000. Their market value to-day would perhaps not be more than one-half of that amount. Farm commodities are worth only a fraction of the price they were two years ago. Take cotton, for example, in 1929, which was not a good price year, the crop sold for $1,245,000,000, in 1930 for $656,000,000, and in 1931 it is estimated to bring $432,000,000, although it is the second largest crop that has been produced. Lack of power to buy and consume by the masses is the explanation.

IMPROVEMENT BONDS

During the apparently prosperous years from 1925 to 1929 improvement bonds were issued by municipalities, districts, counties, and States for a long period of years, placing fixed charges of principal and interest upon the people. Regardless of the price of commodities these charges remain the same in dollars. Gross State expenditures increased from $1,242,000,000 in 1923 to $1,826,000,000, or 47 per cent, in 1928. Municipal, district, and county expenses during the same time increased 32 per cent. State and local bonded indebtedness in 1922 was $7,153,000,000; in 1928 it was $12,608,000,000; an increase of 76 per cent, or from $65 to $105 per capita. State and local tax collections were $4,015,000,000 in 1923. By 1928 they had jumped to $6,464,000,000, an increase from $36.54 to $53.19 per capita. Improvement-bond obligations and taxes are fixed charges which are not affected by commodity prices. They operate in most cases as liens against any and every kind of property. If these obligations are not met when due, people are sold out of house and home. So to-day, to add to the financial consternation, taxes with which to meet governmental expenses and bond obligations are the problem that seems to be beyond solution. If the bondholders, through the process of law, should foreclose their bond mortgages and acquire title to the properties securing them, they would but cancel their claims against their debtors and become the subject for ad valorem tax burdens now so heavily resting upon others. What is the solution? Sales under trust deeds and mortgages securing bonds and like instruments will not solve the question. We must look for a more equitable tax system than the ad valorem method. We must devise new credit machinery and a new method for stabilizing the purchase power of the dollar—not in relation to the fluctuating value of gold but in relation to the index number of commodity values. After all, the chief purpose of money should be to furnish a systematic method to facilitate the exchange of commodities and values.

Almost everyone you meet has some theory as to the cause and the remedy for the depression. Some contend that the Hawley-Smoot high tariff bill was the chief contributing cause of the world financial disturbance. There can be no doubt that the psychology of the move to force such a tariff measure upon the statute books was the cause of much economic disturbance. In this country and throughout the world the administration in power continually asserted that we were enjoying great prosperity and that business was gathering returns as it never had before. Then the hearings were begun on the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill. I saw big business men with economic experts in every line of manufacturing, business activity, and commercial endeavor appear before the Ways and Means Committee and tell their tale of woe. They came in great hoards and by the hundreds, until, all told, more than 1,000 witnesses appeared before the Ways and Means Committee of the House, demanding a tariff on each and every schedule as it was read. In order that these messengers of ill luck might be accorded a tariff on the several schedules, they and their experts told pitiful tales of the miserable condition in which the business of the Nation was groveling. They not only convinced the Republican membership of the Ways and Means Committee—who, by the way, were the only ones permitted to have anything at all to do with writing the tariff bill—that business was in a deplorable condition but they convinced the country that business was bad. Resentment toward our tariff act was felt throughout the world, retaliation, and boycotting to a degree, was our reward. Our total foreign trade for the years 1925 to 1929, inclusive, was $24,953,000,000. Our purchases abroad were $21,333,000,000, leaving a favorable trade balance to us for the five years of $3,620,000,000. None of these amounts is very imposing when compared with the shrinkage of $40,000,000,000 a year in our national income and $90,000,000,000 in two years in the securities listed on the New York stock exchange. But it is absolutely necessary for us to develop foreign trade if we are to prosper as a producer Nation.

SILVER QUESTION

The savings of two-thirds of the people of the world have been represented by hoarded silver. China, the most populous nation, India, Mexico, and many other countries have used silver as the basis for their currency. It represented their wealth as well as their purchasing power. Shortly after the World War silver, as a commodity, sold in the market as high as $1.60 an ounce. Within recent weeks it has sold as low as 26 cents an ounce. The great fall in the price of silver brought a corresponding fall in the purchasing power of two-thirds of the people of the world. Not having the power to purchase imported commodities, they ceased to be consumers of imported goods.

GOLD STANDARD

Our statutory credit and banking plan is based on the gold standard. The gold standard is declared by statute. It is simply this: "The dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine shall be the standard unit of value, and of forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity." That is, the price of gold is fixed at $20.67 an ounce. By the gold standard our Government agrees to buy all the gold from every source at the price specified, and it agrees also to sell all the gold demanded of it by any nation or nations without restraint or hindrance at the same price. Theoretically, a country on gold standard must keep on hand a stock of monetary metal sufficient to supply at all times any demands which may appear for the redemption in gold of paper money, silver, bank deposits, foreign exchange, and balances. Every private contract in a gold-standard country is payable in gold. Every bank deposit is repayable in gold. The wide scope of responsibility that the gold standard assumes will be appreciated when we recall that the bank clearances of our State and national banks reached the figure of $702,533,000,000 in 1929. Each dollar of these clearances in theory could have been demanded in gold. Yet the Federal reserve bank placed the total amount of the world's monetary gold at $11,300,000,000. This would make a cube, if formed together into one solid block, not more than 31 feet for each dimension. Eleven billion three hundred million dollars worth of gold must form the basis for the currencies of all countries whose moneys are based on a gold standard.

The gold standard is the kind of a currency basis that is favored by the banking systems of the world. A close check is kept on the movements of gold. Every day information may be had as to the exact amount of gold held by each country in the world. The movements of gold can be, and are, controlled by the big world bankers. When we consider that 12 banks in the United States two years ago had resources of over $20,000,000,000, which is practically twice the amount of the world's supply of monetary gold, it is very apparent that the movements of gold will be directed in accordance with profitable business for the banking systems. Big bankers will always insist that gold is the only proper basis on which to found the currency of any country. They will always insist that a currency based on any other value than that of gold will be a failure. Gold should not be discarded for use in connection with our money or exchange system. Its purchasing power should be fixed and regulated in relation to the commodity index price of the things most commonly used in trade. If this is not done, there will be a constant fluctuation and change in commodity prices because of the maladministration of gold.

Gold flows so easily from a debtor nation to a creditor nation, or is so easily manipulated by a method of piling up credits by a nation which is on the gold-exchange standard, that rapid changes can be caused to take place in gold holdings. The United States and France, having only 162,000,000 of 2,000,000,000,000 people in the world, possess two-thirds of the world's monetary supply of gold. A legal gold reserve for the almost $5,000,000,000 of currency in this country would perhaps be about $2,000,000,000. Certainly $3,000,000,000 in gold would be sufficient, yet within recent months we reached the peak of $5,015,000,000 in gold holdings. Certainly we did not need more than half of that amount to stabilize our currency.

The other half was locked up in our vaults, and the world was deprived by us of the use of one-fourth the world's gold supply, when we had no immediate use for it, according to the theory of the gold standard. France, which needs only $1,062,500,000 to properly stabilize her circulating medium, held gold to the amount of $2,484,250,000, a surplus of $1,421,000,000. England holds only 4½ per cent of the world's gold supply, Germany 2½ per cent, Russia 2½ per cent, or these three great nations hold less than 10 per cent of the world's gold supply, while the United States and France hold more than 65 per cent of it. By the method of manipulating, or the maladministration of gold so as to virtually retire from use one-third of the world's gold supply for currency-stabilizing purposes, the price of gold has been boosted to such a point that it is practically impossible to buy it with commodities.

What will be the effect on the gold-standard system prevailing in the United States and France if these two countries acquire possession of so much gold that the other nations find it impossible to aspire to a return of the gold standard? If only two countries can use the gold standard for their money, must all other countries continue to meet their international obligations and pay their unfavorable trade balances in gold? Great Britain and Canada and the major countries of Latin America do business on a nongold basis. Japan, China, India, in fact, every government in Asia does business on a nongold basis, most of them having a silver currency. The only European countries using the gold basis are France, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Belgium, Italy, Poland, and Rumania, and in these the finance ministers are authorized to issue exchange restrictions. The United Kingdom, Norway, Finland, Denmark, and Sweden are counted completely off of the gold basis. Mexico, Brazil, Chili, and Argentina have resorted to a managed currency, which is not backed by a gold standard in any sense. The currency systems throughout the world are in deplorable confusion because of the methods of credit control exercised by American and international bankers whose only yardstick of value is gold. These international-credit vendors have arranged loans and placed contractual burdens to pay bonds and bank obligations in gold until a solution of the dilemma is impossible if these bonds and these promises to pay gold are to remain. Ask yourself the question: What are the outstanding promises of all the governments of the world—the kind of promises we call the "national debt"?

I have seen them estimated at more than $200,000,000,000, yet in theory and according to the contracts practically all of this is payable in gold, when there is little more than $10,000,000,000 of monetary gold in all the world. The vaunted utility and stability of the gold standard is contradicted by the physical facts. The contracts to pay in gold to the extent of $100,000,000,000 or more are impossible of performance. Gold has become so dear in price that commodities sufficient in number can not be produced and exchanged for money in a sufficient amount to meet the taxes, mortgage obligations, and money requirements of the people, which money our law says shall be kept on a parity with gold. A great impediment stands in the way of the enactment of adequate credit machinery which would enable the laborer to labor and the producer to sell his commodities. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Andrew W. Mellon, shares the views of those who would perpetuate the system that has brought the great evil. He has directed the financial policies in cooperation with the big banking interests of this and foreign countries for the past 10 years. He is accredited with being one of the richest and one of the most influential men in the financial world. He has been accounted a wizard in finance. He and those with whom he has advised are undoubtedly responsible for the deplorable condition, not only in our land but largely throughout the civilized world. They have year in and year out continued to kill the golden goose until the task has been completely accomplished. They are now waking up to the fact that prosperity is not with us, that it is not even "just around the corner," that its shadow has entirely vanished. Woe unto the people because of such financial wisdom!

While the laborer finds no employment, the farmer, who has produced an abundant supply of crops of every kind, because of the high price of gold, can not sell his crops for enough to meet his obligations. On the one hand we see laborers by the millions destitute, hungry, and unemployed; on the other hand, in the same community, we see abundant harvests of foodstuffs and farm products needed by those without jobs. Yet the two can not come together and strike a bargain, because our monetary system and credit machinery have fallen short in meeting this emergency. A fundamental revision of the purchasing power of the dollar must be made so as to fix the buying power of the dollar in relation to the price of commodities, debts, and financial obligations.

One of Mr. Mellon's coworkers, Mr. J. W. Pole, is Comptroller of the Currency. He incessantly goes up and down the country crying out for bigger banking institutions—the bigger the better they suit him. He also wants them to have innumerable branches operating "within the trade territory." The United States can never recover with such men directing the credit policies of our country. They are in accord with that policy which drives the small banker, the small merchant, the individual operator in every field out of business.

LEGISLATIVE REMEDIES

Various legislative remedies have been proposed to put us back on the road to prosperity. It has been suggested that $1,500,000,000 be raised by floating bonds with which to pay off in cash the soldiers' bonus certificates. It has been suggested that $5,000,000,000 worth of Government bonds be sold and the proceeds of them used to build public roads and do other work so as to give employment to some of the unemployed. We now have before the House for consideration a proposal to place in the hands of the Federal land banks $100,000,000 so the banks can defer selling many people out of house and home on their farm loans. Many other remedies for relief have been proposed. When we get sick physically we all turn doctors and seek out a remedy for our malady. The financial malady with which this country and the world is now obsessed is indeed great, and there are many doctors prescribing remedies. Yet I tell you that these are salves on the symptoms of our trouble.

What are these amounts when compared to the loss in investments alone, which have shrunk from $136,000,000,000 to less than $46,000,000,000 in the short period of two years? What are these amounts when compared to the $40,000,000,000 loss in annual income and the diminished values in real estate and other properties? Our Government ran at a deficit of almost $1,000,000,000 last year. The remedy must be more fundamental than has been suggested. It is my view that a broader basis for our currency must be adopted. A world conference on silver should be arranged by the leading nations of the world, because silver would supply an admirable addition to the base in broadening and reviving the purchasing power of money. We have already, by statute, authorized the participation of the United States in a world silver conference. It is my deliberate judgment that such a conference would have been arranged and the money of two-thirds of the people of the world would have been saved but for the fact that monetary gold is small in amount and easily managed, and but for the fact that one of the managers of gold, Andrew W. Mellon, is and has been for 11 years Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. When we revive the purchasing power of the countries whose currencies are on a silver basis we make it possible for them to buy the products of our factories and farms.

THE PURCHASING POWER OF THE DOLLAR

I repeat again that the purchasing power of the dollar should be stabilized in relation to the value of commodity prices along the line of the plan proposed by Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale. That is the only complete solution of the money question. The purpose of currency is to facilitate the exchange of commodities between man and man, country and country, and that should be the working result of any monetary system. I would not advocate any monetary system which overlooks providing a means of savings in hard-money silver, as well as gold, for there are classes of people that require such medium for the encouragement of thrift and through which to hoard savings against the emergencies of life. We are tied down, hungry and starving, by a broken down, inadequate money and currency system in a land of plenty. Our credits and obligations have been so managed by "wizards of finance" that no solution seems possible to our dilemma.

THERE IS NO OVERPRODUCTION

There is no overproduction, as we have been told. There can never be an overproduction of the necessities of life until every man, woman, and child has been provided with sufficient food, clothing, and comforts of life. There may be, and there is to-day, great underconsumption because of the 10,000,000 people unemployed who can find no jobs; but there is no overproduction.

GREAT NATURAL RESOURCES

We live in a land of great natural resources. It has the finest soils, the most wonderful climate, forests, rivers, harbors, coal, gases, and oils. It is filled with modern factories, manned by scientifically trained men as no other country in the world. Our ability to do things and accomplish results in this country is indeed great. But those factories are idle, mines are not working, forests are left to grow, shipping is stagnant, and business is sick everywhere. The welfare of the American people has been sacrificed by its selfish managers. They have not been faithful to the trust imposed upon them, as the fruits of their administration testify. While hopeless as our situation seems, and as much as we know that those who have been entrusted for the last 10 years and more with the destinies of our people have miserably failed, we are consoled that the productivity of the land remains. Rivers continue to flow and the sun continues to shine just as if the Republican Party had never come into power.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield so much of my remaining time as he may desire to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, there are many borrowers of our Federal land banks who, in recent times, have deserved more liberal treatment than they have received in extension of overdue paper. I shall vote for this bill which is before us. But there is a feature of the bill concerning which those who are administering the system have a great deal of misgiving. It is my hope, at least, that I may enlighten the House somewhat as to the apprehensions which have risen with regard to the bill in its present form.

The immediate necessity for this legislation unquestionably is that in some districts of the country borrowers who are in extremis have not had such sympathetic consideration as should have been given under all the circumstances. Generally speaking, the 12 land banks have been very considerate.

To make the situation clear, let me give you these figures. On November 30, 1931, there were 408,000 outstanding loans in the 12 banks of the system. Of the total number, 83,230 were delinquents, and of the eighty-three thousand and odd delinquents only 3,848 are under foreclosure to-day. Of the total net mortgage loans of the system, which amount to $1,171,000,000, the unpaid principal of defaulted loans amounts to a little over 1 per cent, or $15,670,000.

In isolated instances it has been alleged by gentlemen who are much more familiar with the situation than I—such as the gentleman from Alabama, for whose judgment in these matters I have great respect—that very little leniency had been shown by local land banks to delinquent debtors.

Through no fault of the gentleman from Alabama or any other person than myself, I was unable to be present at the meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee when section 4 was written into the bill. On the day that this provision was inserted in the bill the price of farm-loan bonds went down 2 points. I do not say to the House that the introduction of the amendment caused that drop. Possibly the drop would have occurred anyway, but it is said by men intimately associated with the administration of the system that the insertion of the section in question strongly contributed to this drop in prices of the bonds.

Yesterday the best bid which could be had on the Federal land bank 4½ percent bonds, maturing in 1953, was 75. The bonds of the system carry from 4 to 5 per cent on the average. The present market price of the 4½ per cents affords the investor 6.29 per cent on his money.

On that basis these bonds are not attractive enough to the average investor to stimulate a great demand and result in an increased bid.

Now, let us see about this provision that is written into the law. It is not mandatory; it leaves it to the discretion of the boards of directors of the land banks to determine whether under the circumstances of each case they will grant an extension. Let us say they grant an extension of only three years. They decide that such an extension is all the facts in the particular case will justify. At the end of three years the debtor in question is still unable to meet his obligations. Further extension is refused and foreclosure proceedings are instituted. In such a case, if the law contained no reference to a definite term for extension, the case would be closed. But if section 4 is retained, the borrower will insist that he has a right to a 5-year extension.

The foreclosure comes before the justice or the judge in that district, and that judge or justice is human. He looks with natural sympathy toward the borrower, and when urged in equity to issue a foreclosure decree, his inquiry naturally is as to what has been done to save the borrower. The moment it appears that the full extension of five years has not been granted there is going to be a great unwillingness to issue foreclosure decrees until the full 5-year extension has been granted in every individual instance.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Not now.

Mr. BURTNESS. Right on that point.

Mr. BEEDY. If the Chair will warn me when I have consumed 15 minutes, then I shall endeavor to yield first to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] and then to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS]. The result is going to be a continually increasing pressure on the part of all these borrowers to get a definite 5-year extension. That necessarily would result in a continual increase of the frozen credits of the system. When such extensions become general the securities behind these bonds are depreciated in the sight of the investing public. They become less and less attractive as an investment. In such a situation what can the system resort to? The interest rate on these land-bank bonds must be increased in order to make them more attractive to the average investor. If the present rate of from 4 to 5 per cent is increased to 6 per cent, who must ultimately pay that increased rate of interest? The borrower himself. So that if you trace the operation of this section in its administration to its conclusion, you will see why there is a very grave and well-founded apprehension that this section will result in doing the very thing the system seeks most to accomplish, namely, to extend the farmer credit at a low cost.

In order that the RECORD may be clear, I have made this statement. I sincerely trust that those who now entertain the grave apprehensions I have outlined will find themselves to be in error. We can not defeat this measure on the floor and no one of us would take the responsibility of opposing it lest we lose that large measure of relief which we desire for borrowers from our Federal land banks. I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman has answered what I had in mind.

Mr. BEEDY. I now yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS].

Mr. BURTNESS. I heard with interest the remarks made by the gentleman as to what the courts would do. I am not familiar with any proceeding in any State where the court would have anything to do with that at all. The court would simply determine whether or not there was a default under the contract, and if there is a default under the contract, the court would be compelled to file its decree of foreclosure. Of course, in equity, a court would have certain powers in the States, in the exercise of its discretion in granting time in which the individual debtor might make good the default.

Mr. BEEDY. That is the point.

Mr. BURTNESS. That would be a default under the practice. In most States it is statutory.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman has stated the point in the closing part of his question.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman says that this will probably cause the raising of the rate to the farmer.

Mr. BEEDY. Let us not put it that way. There is a fear that it might result. I do not care to predict that it will.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am going to put that over against the actuality. If a note falls due and is in default, automatically the rate of interest rises to 8 per cent under the statute unless they have the right and do extend the note as we propose to do, and we are directly taking care to the extent of 2 per cent of the man who is in default, because he is not automatically penalized with 2 per cent additional to his interest when it is in default. They have the right when they extend this to make out a new paper.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman is right in so far as he goes. That rate of 8 per cent would obtain if the default occurred and the note is suspended right where it is. But the point I make is of broader application.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman does not say that the board at present has the right to waive that 2 per cent additional interest?

Mr. BEEDY. No.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will you give them the right to fix that?

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman has now made himself clear to me. There is no right to suspend that penalty, but that increased rate of interest affects only those who having borrowed and having failed to meet their obligations must pay the penalty provided in such cases. As I have stated, there are only 3,848 defaulted loans.

I am talking about the general rate of interest which must be paid by all the hundreds of thousands of future borrowers from the system in the first instance.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understand the difference entirely, but we are going to look a little bit after the fellow that is in the ditch with a mule on top of him.

Mr. BEEDY. Yes; and that is why this legislation is here. Members on both sides of the House who are interested in this legislation are inspired by the highest motives. I take this opportunity to say that, speaking as a plain citizen, I am proud of the attitude that has been manifested by the Democratic Party in all stages of the legislation which has come before the present Congress. I think there is unquestionably an honest purpose on the part of the Democratic Members to give to the people of the country, irrespective of the source from which the legislation originates, whatever wholesome, constructive legislation is deemed necessary. [Applause.]

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. I am not clear on one statement that the gentleman from Maine has made to the effect that section 4 might result in a general demand for a postponement for five years. Section 4, as I read it, does not result in any general postponement for five years at all. It gives a period of five years over which back payments might be spread.

Mr. BEEDY. That is right.

Mr. LEAVITT. And one-fifth of it would be paid in one year?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes. The back payments would be averaged over the five years. Every payment as it accrues would be increased by the amount of one-fifth of the overdue payments for the next five years. Within the discretion of the individual bank, these extensions may be made as the circumstances justify. If the extension is for three years, the defaulted payments are prorated over a period of three years only.

But the question is, Will these debtors feel that they have been used fairly if foreclosure proceedings are brought against them at any time within the limit of five years? Will they not continually demand a full 5-year extension?

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. May the extension granted by the directors be for a less time than five years?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes; it may be and unquestionably will be in many instances. Where it is granted for less than the five years I have just been raising the question as to whether we are not going to have the same fault finding that we are now having—that the bank has been hard-boiled and unsympathetic unless a full 5-year extension is granted. The period for extension should be wholly within the discretion of the various directorates of the 12 banks.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. My criticism goes to the former paragraph, that the power to extend does not indicate the length of time. The length of time comes in here in connection with the right to pay. The phraseology is plain.

Mr. BEEDY. The Farm Loan Board is opposed to this section as it is now written. I am therefore calling the attention of the House to the serious problem presented by the wording of this section. We hope that it will not in any way impair the efficiency of the system, but I myself do not see how it can fail to do so.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. Assuming that section 4 were not in this bill, then the only recourse in the case of default would be foreclosure, would it not?

Mr. BEEDY. No. The board still has discretion, if the facts and circumstances justify it, to make extensions.

Mr. BURTNESS. To let them run as past due?

Mr. BEEDY. The proof of it is that while there are 83,000 delinquents out of more than 800,000 loans, the number of foreclosures is only 3,848. There are only 5.7 per cent of the delinquents listed in the 12 banks which to-day are in process of foreclosure.

Mr. BURTNESS. But how many of those have made preliminary demands, threatening foreclosure unless they were paid within a few days?

Mr. BEEDY. Of course I can not tell the gentleman about that.

Mr. BURTNESS. I am sure the gentleman will find there are a great many of them.

Mr. BEEDY. They are holding in extension thousands of these defaulted cases.

Mr. BURTNESS. Exactly; until this legislation can be enacted. Many of them are held in suspense.

Mr. BEEDY. That may be true, but the management of the system is sympathetic, as a whole, with the debtors whose payments are overdue. They want to extend loans just as long as it seems wise under the facts and circumstances. The various banks are, of course, anxious to do everything possible to meet the interest payments on their bond issues.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman say that from experience the foreclosure of these mortgages has brought in any money with which to pay interest on the bonds, or whether more harm has been done to the system in being deprived of money with which to pay the interest on the bonds than would have otherwise have been the case if they could have adopted such a policy as is embodied in section 4?

Mr. BEEDY. The system recognizes that, and I think that is why about 80,000 of these defaulted loans are being held in the 80,000 individual instances. That is the real reason for their being held in suspension and not the outcome of this legislation. They are nursing these cases along and doing everything they can to prevent foreclosure in order to insure meeting interest payments on the bonds as they fall due.

Mr. BURTNESS. I would like to ask a question with reference to the market price of these bonds.

Mr. BEEDY. If the gentleman will excuse me, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has been on his feet a long time. He is one of our esteemed colleagues of long service, and I desire to yield to him. My time has about expired.

Mr. TUCKER. My friend is a member of the committee that framed this bill. I am not enthusiastic about the bill.

Mr. BEEDY. Neither am I, as I have been pointing out.

Mr. TUCKER. I would like the gentleman to explain the first section to me. In the first section I find the following:

> It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States, upon the request of the board of directors of any Federal land bank made with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to subscribe from time to time for capital stock of such bank in an amount or amounts specified in such approval or approvals.

"From time to time"—from time to eternity.

Mr. BEEDY. As long as the system endures.

Mr. TUCKER. Have we the power? Are we taking away by that provision the right, the duty of the Congress alone to appropriate money, and give it to the whim of the Farm Loan Board?

Mr. BEEDY. Well, that raises an interesting question that some day may have to be settled by the Supreme Court.

Mr. TUCKER. No, sir. It is our duty to settle it here.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, you will of course appreciate the utter impossibility of discussing as fully as I would like to the essential features of House Resolution 6172 in the short time allotted to me by the distinguished chairman of our Committee on Banking and Currency. Personally, I think it a very happy hour we have reached in this Congress when we can direct our best thought and attention toward the consideration of plans which are designed to bring about domestic relief and assist our own people. On yesterday we passed a resolution which the administration represented to Members of Congress to be necessary to avert a calamity in Europe. The favorable passage of that resolution was, according to information furnished us by our President, essential if we were to maintain the national integrity of our country. Its primary purpose, as represented to us by those in authority, was to avert a calamity in Europe which would inevitably adversely affect the welfare of every American citizen. It is my candid opinion that with the enactment of this legislation which we are now facing, we will to a certain extent avert a calamity in our own land. Though the present bill does not go as far in relieving the indebted and perhaps bankrupt farmer as I think his situation deserves, nevertheless in the circumstances, which can be corroborated by reference to the hearings before our committee, it is about the best bill we could hope to have favorably acted upon by the Congress.

It is needless to state that there is no situation so acute and quite so distressing and alarming to-day as that involving the wholesale foreclosure of farm-land mortgages. Legislation which will assist in stopping immediately this unwholesome condition, with its inevitable devastation and wreckage of homes, is perhaps as important at this juncture as any other of a similar character which will engage the attention of this Congress. As a new Member last session, I tried to the utmost of my capacity to secure some remedial legislation in this direction. But my efforts were of no avail. In keeping with the original purposes of the act of 1926, creating the Federal Farm Loan Board, according to the statement of Mr. Bestor, commissioner of land banks, who appeared before our committee in advocacy of this legislation, this bill is primarily intended to insure the maintenance of the Federal land bank system, to stabilize the bonds, and to provide operating capital with which to further the making of loans to farmers. These purposes are undoubtedly worthy ones, and the carrying out of the same will unquestionably have a generally beneficial effect. However, I was one among other members of the committee who felt that the present situation demanded that some form of legislation be immediately enacted into the law which would insure during these abnormal times, a more definite policy by the Federal Farm Loan Board toward leniency and consideration for the thousands of distressed borrowers.

I further felt that this bill should include authorization to the directors of the various land banks to effectuate practical plans whereby mortgagors who have lost their homes and property could by liberal terms in keeping with the present situation redeem their lost properties when the same was still in the hands of the land bank or its agents. I furthermore felt that, if practical and constitutional, some provision should be made to give preference in the extension of credit to bona fide owners of farms who lived thereon and actually cultivated the land. Though there are many farmers throughout my district who are indebted to Federal and joint-stock land banks, there are other reasons why I am extremely interested in legislation of this kind. We all know that the test of the success in government depends largely upon the degree that it is able to insure security and happiness in the home. I therefore plead with each of you, irrespective of party lines, that we turn this evening our minds and faces homeward and as far as possible visualize the plight of those who are living in fear of the sheriff's hammer. Personally, I believe as a rule in following the true and tried paths of finance. But we all are agreed that under extraordinary circumstances and in emergencies like these which we now face ordinary measures prove inadequate. Of course I would not be interested in adopting merely palliative measures which were fundamentally unsound and, though perhaps temporarily pleasing, would in the end cause greater hardship and suffering than the deplorable condition which they undertook to remedy.

This bill, as I understand it, is the initial step in the program of our President in his effort to bring about economic restoration and adjustment of economic dislocations. At this point, may I say, as one who differs with our President in many ways and who is unable to indorse his policies and concur in his judgment in normal times, that it will be my purpose throughout this crisis and until we emerge from this valley of depression and despair to go with him in his program as far as I can conscientiously and consistently do so. Believing that he is sincere in his efforts to carry us forward to better times, I shall, to the extent of my ability, try and share with him the great responsibilities and burdens which are daily bearing heavily on his heart and shoulders. Without intending to sacrifice any of the great and glorious principles of the Democratic Party, to which I belong, it is my intention and desire to act during this Congress as an American citizen first and then as a member of my great party.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I gladly yield.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Do I understand from the gentleman's statement that it is the wish and intent of the Banking and Currency Committee that the people who have the administration of that law shall be lenient as possible to the owners who are in distress at this particular time?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Section 4 of the bill was designed to insure that accomplismment.

Mr. ABERNETHY. And that is the real intent of Congress in passing this legislation; is not that so?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes; I think you are entirely correct in that conclusion. I might say in this connection for the committee that all of us were interested in working out a bill that would be practical and sound in principle; yet we were, because of present conditions, particularly interested in providing relief to the distressed borrower and insuring for him from those in authority the greatest consideration. All of us recognize that it would be unwise to take any excursions into new and untried fields of legislation, unsound in principle and impracticable in application, and we, of course, had to be mindful and careful not to do anything which would affect the soundness of the land bank's financial structure. All of us well know that it is impossible to lay down any absolute rule for the administration of a measure of this character. In the last analysis, we appreciate the fact that its success is largely dependent upon the attitude, method, and manner in which it is approached and administered by those in charge.

Though Mr. Bestor would not commit the Federal Farm Loan Board to a policy of greater consideration to the borrower, he stated emphatically that the board had done and would continue to do everything reasonable and in keeping with humane and common-sense principles to aid the mortgagors in meeting their payments and preventing foreclosures.

Any contention regarding the passage of this bill will, of course, be directed toward section 4. Some members of the committee felt that under the present act the board had authority not only to defer foreclosures after default but to grant extensions. To be able to answer questions on this point, I spent a large portion of last night studying the original act with its amendments and reviewing carefully the testimony of the hearings before the committee last year regarding a similar bill which the distinguished chairman of our committee sought to have enacted into law. The result of my study last night convinced me that no such provision now exists under the present law.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. In conclusion, may I say that in my judgment section 4 of the present bill gives to the board the authority which it is necessary that it shall have if the perhaps main purpose of this legislation, and that is to aid the distressed borrower, is put into effect. In the Federal land bank system there are 12 per cent of the land mortgages of this country. On all sides efforts are being made by our Government to provide a way to thaw out or handle sound but frozen assets in our financial institutions.

Section 4 of this bill merely gives the board, in its discretion and where conditions justify, the right to assist borrowers to renew their obligations in the same way that debtors to other financial institutions will be able to renew and extend their obligations if our President's program calling for the enactment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is carried out by this Congress. It must be a matter of common knowledge to all of us that as a practical business proposition it is far better to renew the note of a deserving debtor and keep it alive by the payment of interest than it is to force him to sacrifice his property during these times when there is no value on or market for the property. I was particularly pleased to hear our distinguished floor leader announce to the House yesterday morning that the President had conveyed to him a message assuring Congress that with the passage of this measure and the establishment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, backed by the Government with a fund of $2,000,000,000, joint stock land banks, though not specifically designated in the bill for assistance, would be adequately taken care of by way of loans under rules and regulations prescribed by the new emergency corporation's board of directors. Of course, these organizations are akin to each other, but since joint-stock land banks are, like national banks, privately owned, the only means by which the Government can aid them will be by loans rather than the provision of capital, as will be done with respect to Federal land banks if this bill is enacted into law.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I want to thank the distinguished gentleman from Maine for his magnanimity and his generous comments on the efforts put forth on the Democratic side of the House so far during the present session of Congress. I will say to the gentleman that all Members on this side expect hereafter and at all times to work hard and industriously in the effort to solve any of the problems which confront the country.

In connection with this particular bill I will remind the gentleman that the only thing that has made it possible for this House to pass the measure at this time is the work that was done during the last session of Congress in connection with a bill introduced by a Democrat from Alabama, which bill was referred to the Banking and Currency Committee and upon which hearings were held during the last session of Congress. [Applause.] That bill was substantially the same in its provisions and purposes as the present measure before us, except that we make the appropriation in this instance $100,000,000 instead of $60,000,000, as provided in the bill last year. The accentuation of the distress throughout the country has made it necessary to enlarge the amount accordingly.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman wrote me this summer asking me to help him get his bill out of committee when the Congress convened at a time before we knew which side would control, did he not, and did not I say I would help him?

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman did, and I thank him. I thank the gentleman and I thank the entire administration for having gone along as well as they have in connection with this legislation.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER], a great lawyer, and one we all honor, love, and revere, evidently has not given his usual close attention to the provisions of this bill. There is not a thing in this measure which authorizes the Federal land bank and the Federal Farm Loan Board to make drafts at their own pleasure upon the Treasury of the United States from time to time. We simply authorize in this bill the appropriation of $100,000,000 out of the Treasury, which goes into a revolving fund, and which may be drawn upon in limited amounts by any land bank from time to time upon the request of the bank officials, with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board.

I want to say in this connection it is not thought that the Treasury of the United States will ever lose one dollar advanced to these land banks. They have securities now which under any ordinary circumstances ever known in the memory of any Member of this House would enable them to float their bonds with the investing public, and take care of all their requirements without any resort to the Treasury of the United States for aid.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. BRIGGS. I simply want to tell the gentleman that I strongly favor this measure and I would like to ask him with reference to section 4 if it is the intention of the committee that this section providing for extensions shall be liberally construed by the board in the exercise of its discretion.

Mr. STEAGALL. I can not say what will be done by the Federal Farm Board under its own rules and regulations. We have their assurance and that of the President in his message to Congress their purpose is to aid the farmers of the country.

Mr. BRIGGS. Let me ask the gentleman just this question: I notice it was stated by one of the banks that all borrowers and officers of farm-loan associations should understand that it is a waste of time to ask for extensions. Is not this very section put in here so it will not be a waste of time to ask for an extension when an emergency exists?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is one of the purposes of this bill and one of the particular things sought to be accomplished by the particular section to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am very pleased to hear the gentleman say that because I thought that was the purpose of the section.

Mr. STEAGALL. With respect to the bonds let me say now that there are many bonds carried by the banks and the investment public in this country which can not be realized upon simply because of the unusual conditions and because of the economic situation in which we are involved at this time. The Federal land-bank bonds have stood up remarkably well under all the circumstances, and with all deference to everyone, and I certainly would not speak otherwise, I do not think any gentleman would insist that legislation advancing $100,000,000 to the Federal land banks could fail to stimulate the market for its bonds. Any other contention would be utterly without foundation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 7, secs. 691–697), is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph, as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States, upon the request of the board of directors of any Federal land bank made with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to subscribe from time to time for capital stock of such bank in an amount or amounts specified in such approval or approvals, such subscriptions to be subject to call in whole or in part by the board of directors of said bank upon 30 days' notice with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to take out and pay for shares having an aggregate par value equal to the amounts so called; and to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay for stock issued hereunder there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $100,000,000. Shares of stock issued pursuant to this paragraph shall be paid off at par and retired in the same manner as the original capital stock of said bank after said original stock outstanding, if any, has been paid off and retired: Provided, however, That stock issued from time to time pursuant to this paragraph may, in the discretion of the directors and with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, be paid off at par and retired in whole or in part; and that said board may require such stock to be paid off at par and retired in whole or in part out of available resources of said bank. The proceeds of all repayments on account of stock issued pursuant to this paragraph shall be held in the Treasury of the United States and shall be available for the purpose of paying for other stock thereafter issued pursuant to this paragraph."

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I believe the passage of the pending bill is the best Christmas present that the House of Representatives could give the farmers of the country.

It is estimated that in one county in the State of Alabama 62 per cent of the farms are under farm land-bank mortgages, and I am informed that one weekly newspaper in a small county in Alabama, in one issue, carried 49 notices of foreclosure under land-bank mortgages.

The bill makes available $100,000,000 for the land banks, and if it is enacted into law and is properly administered, it should mean that in large measure there will be an end of these foreclosures; that the awful fear will be lifted from the hearts of thousands of men, women, and children, and that they will have the sweet assurance that in this time of economic distress they will not be driven out of their homes.

As the present distinguished chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee has said, many of us under his leadership sought to secure at the last session of Congress a favorable report on the pending bill, or one of similar nature, from the Banking and Currency Committee, but that report was denied.

The present Banking and Currency Committee was elected on Tuesday of this week. Within 48 hours of its election, it had favorably reported the pending bill, and to-dav, within the remarkably short time of four days, it brings to this House for action the pending bill.

I feel the committee and its chairman, who has given to it direction and leadership, deserve the thanks of the House and of the country.

Of the far-reaching and important legislation which must be enacted in this crisis in our country's history, the greater part must come from the Committee on Banking and Currency, and this committee takes a place second to none in this House. The committee in this hour is most fortunate to have as its chairman the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, my colleague [Mr. STEAGALL] [applause], whose fine ability, integrity of purpose, devotion to the public welfare, and sympathetic understanding of the people and their problems command the esteem and the confidence of the House. [Applause.] Alabama is proud to claim him as her own. [Applause.]

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I had hoped that you would be relieved of hearing anything from me for at least one or two months of this session. But the bill that has been brought out from the Banking and Currency Committee is the one ray of hope, the one real sign, that looks toward the amelioration of the condition of the people of my section of the country, who, by the foreclosures of their homes and farms, are being put out into the streets and highways.

I was one of the 100 who voted against the moratorium of the President of the United States as a protest—not because I was unwilling to help Germany in her disturbed condition, not because I was unwilling to help the international bankers who have been so improvident as to lend Germany $15,000,000,000, but when the President of the United States wired me to give my approval to the proposed moratorium my answer was that if he would give the same moratorium to the distressed debtors of America by Federal owned and controlled institutions I would vote for it.

I have a great deal of respect for a former Member of the House, Ogden Mills. I think he is one of the great financiers in the country. I have respect for the ability of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon; I have respect for the President of the United States. I know him personally, I like him, I appreciate his difficulties, disagreeing with him in politics and in many things. I am not approaching this matter in a partisan way, but the passage of this bill will serve notice on the men who have the enforcement of these governmental agencies that they must understand that there should be the same sympathetic consideration for the people of this country that has been proposed here for Germany and foreign nations.

In my district a few days ago one little bank owed the Federal reserve $12,000 and had $56,000 in securities. The local bank asked for an extension of the notes and the Federal reserve declined and the bank closed its doors.

I favor this legislation, and I want the men who enforce it to understand that it is the intent of this Congress to see that relief is granted to the downtrodden people of America as well as to those in foreign lands. [Applause.]

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, perhaps there is not much to add to this debate. This bill, to all appearances, will be approved by a large majority of the membership of the House.

I think, however, it might be well to emphasize one or two features in view of some of the objections that have been raised by our overconservative friends. The Federal land-bank system was established not for a temporary emergency but as a permanent institution to take care of the long-term credit needs of agriculture. In normal times no particular help was contemplated from the Treasury. It was expected to stand on its own feet. Having that in mind, anyone who is not simply a demagogue or wanting to raise trouble of some sort must concede that one of the fundamental things for the management of land banks always to have in mind is to maintain the solvency of the institution as a whole, to the extent that the interest upon its obligations may be met promptly, which, in turn, means that securities can be floated at low rates to provide money for the farm mortgages, and any other practice would simply wipe out the system as a permanent agency.

Admitting that theory, I have, however, sometimes felt that the management of the Federal land-bank system, the Federal board, and possibly some of the local banks have leaned backward too far, have disregarded practical conditions confronting them, that they have been so set upon making an excellent showing to the extent that every due installment is paid and in their coffers when it is due that they have in many cases forgotten the true interest of the farmer-borrower and the real purpose of the law.

If there is any word I want to send out here this afternoon to those responsible to the management as well as to the farmers, it is that it must not be forgotten in the administration of this act that the interest of the land bank itself and the interest of the farmer borrowers are in each and every case mutual. The bank must be able to sell its securities; the farmers must, however, be able to crop the land properly to pay their installments. I think that should be particularly borne in mind in connection with the administration of section 4 of this bill, which should provide some relief to people who are in default in one or more installments.

I wish that section would have been more liberal. True, defaults can, under its terms, be extended one year and paid in the five next installments, but I would have been better pleased if they could simply have been stepped up in the nature of a ladder in the same way that President Hoover would have preferred the installments on the intergovernmental debts to be stepped up. I mean, of course, discretion to let the installment with interest be paid at the end of the loan, or before that time as agreed on. I think that would have been better, but as France objected to that, in connection with the moratorium, so apparently some one has objected to allowing that discretion in this bill.

Some relief will be obtained by amortizing for a period of five years all installments in default. That will help some, but other methods should be used in proper cases. I was very glad to get the answer which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] gave when, in response to my question, he told that this is not an exclusive remedy, but that the bank and its managers will still have the same discretion which they had heretofore, the same rights and privileges. What I have in mind is this: We all know what has happened with reference to the returns of agriculture in the last decade. We know that many of these loans were made at a time when, if conditions remained as they were at that time, there would have been no difficulty in paying the semiannual payments provided for in the loan, as well as taxes; and, in fact, in good times many of those loans were cut down substantially. Some have been paid down now to a basis where the principal is but 50 or 60 per cent of the original loan, but the installments are made on the old-loan basis, and the farmers can not meet them except with the greatest difficulty. Sometimes they go without needed improvements to do so, which hamper them in their operations. With the lower prices on farm products, the farmer, even though the loan relatively is not a big one, is unable to pay the entire installment that becomes due in any one year and the taxes and other expenses in connection with his farming operations. Therefore, it seems to me that the best interest of the land-bank system and the best interests of the borrower under such circumstances require that that loan that is down to a reasonable basis under the existing value of the land should be written on a new amortization basis. The result then would be that the annual and semiannual payments will be cut proportionately so that the farmer can meet them.

Even under section 4 I fear that the Members of the House are going to hear from that again, because under the present prices of farm products, when a farmer, because of drought, because of the destruction of his crops by grasshoppers, or for other reasons, has gotten into default, not only with reference to one or two installments on the loan but with reference to his taxes, he will the next year be unable to pay all of the taxes as to which he is in default, to pay the current year's amortization payments, and also one-fifth of the installments already in default when the extension is granted. I do not want to take up the time of the House further on this, except to say that the discretion granted here will not cure all the difficulties by any means. It will help some. I am thankful for that. But I wish the committee might have gone further.

I hope and believe that the management of the various banks will exercise that discretion reasonably well. I entertain no such fears as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] entertains, and I suggest to those who think these lank-bank bonds have gone down solely because of lack of confidence in the system, that while lack of confidence has been a factor, the current interest rates have also been a very great factor. If you figure the current prices on these bonds down to an interest-rate basis, even on the low prices now prevailing in the market, you will find they would yield but little more than 6 per cent. This system is not going to the demnition bow-wows at all. It is a fairly sound system, it has succeeded reasonably well, but an unprecedented depression has brought serious problems, and now it needs this $100,000,000 additional provided in this bill, so that it may function satisfactorily for the best interests of all the people of the Nation.

This bill does not embody my views, but it goes a long way in that direction. We must accept it in good faith, and whether it is improved or not by amendments it deserves the support of all of you. In order to show some of the collection methods that have been maintained in one of the banks, which I have openly criticized, and more particularly my views with reference to rewriting loans and amortizing them as new loans, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks by including certain correspondence which I have had with the President of the Federal Land Bank of St. Paul upon these subjects.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTNESS. My letter dated October 16, 1931, deals in a general way with the need of rewriting the loans and also with the practice adopted by some collectors to force farmers to give security on the following year's crop to cover past due and current installments. I also urged that no foreclosures be started where the farmers were doing their best and willing to carry on.

GRAND FORKS, N. DAK., October 16, 1931.

Hon. F. H. KLAWON,
President Federal Land Bank, St. Paul, Minn.

DEAR MR. KLAWON: Please permit me to transmit herewith a letter just received from Mr. J. J. Erlendson, of Hensel, N. Dak., secretary-treasurer of the Crystal Federal Land Bank Association, and which is self-explanatory.

I assume that you and your associates have heretofore given consideration to the proposal which he makes to rewrite loans that have been running for a number of years upon which a substantial amount of principal has been paid, thus putting them into the same shape as if a new loan would be made, including any amount that they may be in default in the principal of the new loan.

This strikes me as a practical suggestion, and I hope that it may receive sympathetic consideration. I realize that upon lower existing values some of such loans may be a little higher than would be granted if there were no prior loan and a new application would be made. On the other hand, it strikes me that the bank would not be the loser, but would by this method get the paper into better shape and would make it that much easier for the borrower to carry on. While we all hope for a change for the better in agriculture, I feel most of us agree that the change will be slow and that it will be difficult for any farmer to pay up accumulated debts of the past two or three years. In other words, the proposal would amount simply to an amortization of his present defaults.

I have at no time criticized the policy of the land bank in asking for further security with reference to unpaid installments and have not advised borrowers, as I understand some officials have, to refuse to give security for past-due installments upon subsequent crops or upon chattels. I do, however, feel that there are many practical objections to doing so both from the viewpoint of the farmer borrower and the viewpoint of the bank. The interests of the borrowers and the land banks are mutual. Unless the borrower can succeed, the bank will have to take on a large amount of real estate, which it certainly does not want. If the land bank ties up all of the available security which a borrower possesses, the latter becomes so embarrassed that he can not possibly farm the land in the way that it should be farmed. This year, more than ever before, the farmers are short of feed and will have to buy it. They have no money and naturally need to use any reserve security they might have either in the form of chattels or of crops. Laborers no longer work as they did 20 or 30 years ago, by the season, and wait for their money until fall, when they could, of course, file a labor lien for their protection. They now demand that their money be paid at least every month, if not every week, and the right to file a labor lien is limited to the laborer who performs the work and is not granted to the person who may lend the farmer money with which to pay his labor. In fact, there is getting to be less and less men hired by the season, and farmers now generally hire only temporary help by the day, who must be paid as the work is done. The same situation is true with reference to feed for his work stock, oil and fuel for tractors, etc.

The point I am making is simply this, that if the farmer has no security to offer during the season to take care of his farming expenses, the land bank itself will suffer, because the land will not be properly farmed and much of it may lie idle.

In this State we are suffering from almost complete crop failure in all but three or four counties. On my farms in Grand Forks County I have gone out and purchased thousands of bushels of grain for the feeding of our cattle, hogs, and sheep. I could not have done this if my income were limited to the income from the farms. Frankly, I do not see how the average farmer can possibly pay his taxes and his installments on his real-estate loans, to say nothing of his indebtedness to the intermediate credit bank or elsewhere upon his chattels. I am just as anxious as anyone that the Federal land bank be in a position to pay the interest on its bonds and continue to receive money, so that it may function for the best interests of agriculture. We are, however, confronted with a serious situation, and I feel that we must not forget what I have already stated in this letter, that in the long run the interests of the borrowers and the bank are mutual. I had personally intended to introduce legislation in the coming session of Congress for relief along the lines proposed by President Hoover. I am very glad that he has taken the initiative in that respect and I hope that we can work out something that will be practical. In the meantime I hope that no foreclosures will be started against farmers who are willing to do their best and who are anxious to continue with their farming operations. Naturally, I am not urging the cessation of foreclosures upon farms where the borrower has thrown up his hands and is either unable or unwilling to proceed further.

Trusting that these suggestions may be given your sympathetic consideration and if need be submitted to the Federal Farm Loan Board, I remain,

Very truly yours,

O. B. BURTNESS.

P. S.—I have taken the liberty of reading the foregoing to Mr. O. P. N. Anderson, president of the Starkweather Association, who dropped in for a visit, and he authorized me to say that my suggestions have his hearty approval, that he regards them as practical, and that he hopes you will give them careful consideration.

O. B. B.

Mr. Klawon, president of the bank, replied under date of October 30, 1931:

THE FEDERAL LAND BANK OF ST. PAUL,
St. Paul, Minn., October 30, 1931.

Hon. O. B. BURTNESS,
Member of Congress, Grand Forks, N. Dak.

DEAR MR. BURTNESS: Your letter of October 16, inclosing letter sent you by Mr. J. J. Erlendson, of Hensel, N. Dak., came to my office during my absence from the city.

The suggestion made by Mr. Erlendson is entirely practical in those cases where the amount of the loan needed by a farmer to refinance his present obligations is of such an amount that under present-day valuations the loan would be one that would come within the requirements of the Federal farm-loan system. We have in a great many instances during the past few years refinanced men who already had loans with this bank under such an arrangement and in these cases the loans have been handled just the same as applications for entirely new loans.

I know from the discussions that we have had with you and as you indicate in your present letter that you agree with us that under existing conditions unusual discrimination is necessary in the selection of first-mortgage farm loans and that necessarily current appraisal values must be upon a reasonably conservative basis. We endeavor in this connection to determine as nearly as we can what farm lands offered as security should be worth based upon the income that they might produce over a period of years in the hands of an average farmer, realizing that, with prices as low as they are to-day, under ordinary conditions a good farmer should be able to produce more income from his land than he was able to this last year.

There can be no question but what the long-term amortization repayment plan of Federal land-bank loans is the logical one for all farmers to use in financing their land holdings. I think that we are all agreed that there never has been a lot of money made over a period of years just from the operation of a farm and that in years gone by a good many of the large accumulations of profit that were apparent in the farming business were the result of increased market prices for farm land.

We are glad to have you say that you are in accord with our general collection policy and practice, and in this connection I wish to reiterate, what we have heretofore told you, that we want to give careful individual consideration to all of the circumstances surrounding each individual loan that we have upon our books. We endeavor to have our field men and association officers furnish us with detailed reports that will make it possible for us to give these cases this necessary consideration, and in those cases where it is apparent that the borrower is doing everything that he can and really wants to carry on and work out of his difficulties and his financial position, his method of operation and the attitude of his other creditors are such that it seems reasonably certain that he is going to be able to do this under ordinary conditions, we are granting reasonable indulgence. We are in practically all of these cases asking that the borrower give us a crop mortgage on crops that he expects to produce during the next growing season and in some cases, personal-property security as well.

It should be entirely fair that the income from land securing a first-mortgage loan should be used, first, to pay taxes and interest upon such loans in order that the farm may be preserved for the owner, not only as a home but for the purpose of producing the necessary income for him to meet all of his outstanding obligations. From this viewpoint it is just as essential to his other creditors that this be done as it is for this bank and the National Farm Loan Association, through which his loan was made. We endeavor to make this practice just as fair to the borrower as it is to the association and this bank. There are cases, of course, where, as you state in your letter, borrowers have given up or are hopelessly insolvent, and in such cases foreclosure is naturally the only logical procedure.

We recognize the fact that a great many farmers in North Dakota this year are finding it unusually difficult on account of crop conditions that existed during the past season, and in considering delinquencies that we have in that State, we are giving due regard to this condition.

President Hoover's suggestion for added capital for the Federal land banks is, I believe, a very sound one, and a plan, if carefully worked out and administered, that will be especially helpful in enlarging the activities of the Federal farm-loan system. It should have the effect of stabilizing the Federal land-bank-bond market upon a favorable interest basis, and if this is done, of course, the banks will be able to procure the necessary funds for making first-mortgage loans to farmers at reasonable rates of interest.

At the present time the interest and tax burdens of our farmers present the most difficult problems that they have to contend with, and anything that can be done to bring about a reduction in these items of cost to the farmer will not only be helpful to agriculture generally but to our country as a whole.

I appreciate your having written us as fully as you did in this case, and note that you discussed your letter with Mr. O. P. N. Anderson, president of the Starkweather National Farm Loan Association, with whom I had the pleasure of visiting at some length in my office a short time ago.

I hope that before you leave for Washington for the next session of Congress you will find it convenient to drop into the bank in order that we may discuss these vital questions with you further. If at any time you have any specific cases brought to your attention, I shall be glad to have you write me concerning them, and will be glad to have your further suggestions from time to time.

Thanking you, I am very truly yours,

F. H. KLAWON, President.

Before the foregoing letter arrived many protests had come to me as to collection methods adopted by the bank. While agreeing with much of what Mr. Klawon stated in his letter, I could not agree with him in all his conclusions, so I wrote him again on November 2, 1931.

GRAND FORKS, N. DAK., November 2, 1931.

Mr. F. H. KLAWON,
President Federal Land Bank, St. Paul, Minn.

DEAR MR. KLAWON: I appreciate your favor of October 30, which I have read with interest.

I am also in receipt of copy of letter written Mr. Torgerson, county auditor of Ward County, which has been forwarded from Washington.

While I am glad to note your assurances that the case of each borrower will be handled on its own merits and while I feel justified to believe that each individual case actually reviewed by yourself or other officers of the bank will receive fair treatment, I am not as confident as I was a few weeks ago that the borrowers will as a rule be treated with the leniency which seems vitally necessary at this time. In other words, I fear that your men in the field and your collection department are more interested in making a showing than they are in making it possible for the farmer to carry on, even though the latter should be of almost as great importance to the bank as to the borrower himself.

I agree that the income from land should be first used to pay taxes and interest upon the mortgage indebtedness and thus preserve the farm for the owner. It must, however, be borne in mind that most of the farmers have no credit and, therefore, must pay cash for items such as twine, threshing costs, repairs to machinery, etc. Fortunately most of them sell enough cream to take care of their grocery bills. Seed and feed, however, must be bought if the Federal land bank insists on a full accounting where the 1931 crop was mortgaged to secure past installments.

As intimated in a former letter, I shall personally be glad to give active support to the proposal to furnish added capital for the Federal land banks from the Treasury. In fact, I am willing to vote to furnish public money for the purpose of segregating land that has been foreclosed, as well as to carry unpaid installments.

Your letter is general and I am not attempting to raise any issue with any of the statements made by you with the exception of making some additional comment on the second paragraph thereof. You state that the refinancing of present obligations is practical in those cases where the sum unpaid "is of such an amount that under present-day valuations the loan would be one that would come within the requirements of the Federal farm-loan system." By implication you hold that if the unpaid amount is greater than would be approved as a new loan, the suggestion is not worthy of consideration.

I can not see it in that light. The land bank is in no different position from what a private individual or corporation would be in if confronted with a similar state of facts. The money is already invested in the land. Defaults have already accumulated to such an extent that with the small earnings of agriculture it does not seem possible that the borrower can catch up for years to come. Amortizing the defaults in a new loan would ordinarily reduce each installment slightly and would give the farmer a few more years in which to retire the entire debt. The land bank would be in no worse condition than it is to-day. In fact, putting the debt into a new form which would seem, and which would be, much easier for the farmer would inspire him with new hope and courage. Within a year or two it might make it possible for him to improve further his farm with fencing and other equipment so vitally necessary in the diversification program which must come throughout this country if our system of agriculture is to become a properly balanced one. Interest would be paid upon the amount in default, and unless our country goes to the damnation bow-wows entirely, the chances for retirement of the entire debt would be very good. If the bank should lose out by adopting that method, it seems certain that it would lose more by taking title to the land and holding it until a buyer can be found.

I hope these suggestions, together with what I stated in my letter of October 30, will receive your continued consideration.

I appreciate your invitation to visit you at the bank before returning to Washington. I shall try to arrange my affairs so as to see you when I go through St. Paul.

Very sincerely yours,

O. B. BURTNESS.

Mr. Klawon's reply of November 5, 1931 was more satisfactory, at least in assuring consideration for each case upon its merits.

THE FEDERAL LAND BANK OF ST. PAUL,
St. Paul, Minn., November 5, 1931.

Hon. O. B. BURTNESS,
Member of Congress, Grank Forks, N. Dak.

DEAR MR. BURTNESS: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of November 2 referring to our letter of October 30.

I presume that Mr. Torgerson, county auditor of Ward County, has sent you a copy of the resolution adopted by the Ward County board under date of October 30 following a conference which our Mr. Thwing had with them.

You may be assured, Mr. Burtness, that all delinquent loans receive careful study and consideration by the senior officers of this institution, who are members of our executive committee, before they are placed in foreclosure. Necessarily, before this is done, our collection department is asked to exhaust every possible effort in either making collections and placing the loan in good standing or obtaining full information regarding the borrower's circumstances in order that we may fairly determine whether or not we would be justified in deferring foreclosure. Under existing conditions, of course, there are a good many cases in which there may be an honest difference of opinion as to the advisability of which is the proper course to pursue. It is only natural that we must be guided to a considerable degree by the bank's past experience in such cases.

In cases where we have a mortgage upon 1931 crops we have tried to cooperate with borrowers in providing for seed and feed for next year's operations. Of course, where some of this crop is going to be used to feed livestock that is to be marketed, and such livestock is mortgaged to some other creditor, we feel that the value of such feed should be released from the sale proceeds of such livestock and applied upon the indebtedness due this bank. This we believe is not only fair, but will ultimately benefit the other borrowers' creditors also. Where borrowers find it necessary to make Federal feed and seed loans we are, of course, willing to give consideration to the matter of signing the necessary waivers. We feel that in these cases we should have full information setting out the need for such feed and seed loans.

In connection with the refinancing of present mortgages for a sufficiently increased amount to take care of current delinquencies, the bank is, of course, limited under the provisions of the Federal farm loan act in the making of loans to loans that do not exceed 50 per cent of the appraised value of land mortgaged plus 20 per cent of the appraised value of the permanent insured improvements thereon. In making appraisals the value of land for agricultural purposes is the basis of appraisal and the earning power of said land must be a principal factor. In this respect, of course, the loaning activities of the Federal land bank must be carried on somewhat differently than those of a private individual or corporation. In a general way, of course, the majority of such cases as are meritorious can be worked out under our policy of permitting a temporary deferment of foreclosure and giving the borrower an opportunity to work out of his difficulties.

I am hopeful that you will find time to call at the bank, as you have indicated in your letter, on your way through St. Paul, so that I may have an opportunity of discussing this with you. The thought occurs to me that possibly you will be going through St. Paul either before or after business hours; and if this is the case and your time here is limited, I will appreciate having you wire me in advance in order that I may arrange to meet you.

Thanking you, I am, yours very truly.

F. H. KLAWON, President.

Without in any way casting aspersions upon any individual, I feel justified in including my letter of October 30, 1931, which comments upon the drastic collection policy pursued in September and October of this year, but which fortunately has now been much moderated. Names are omitted from the letter in this extension:

GRAND FORKS, N. DAK., October 30, 1931.

Hon. F. H. KLAWON,
President Federal Land Bank, St. Paul, Minn.

DEAR MR. KLAWON: I hesitate to write you again before receiving a reply to my letter of the 16th instant, but understand you have been in Washington, so I realize that you are more than busy.

I can not help but wonder whether you men in the bank realize the tremendous criticism that is being made, not only by your borrowers, but by people generally, including our most conservative business men, against the collection methods employed by the bank. Some indication thereof is shown in the resolutions that are now commencing to be passed in various counties of the State, but they amount to little or nothing as showing the intense feeling which exists.

I feel that I have been judicial in my viewpoint with reference to the bank; at least, I have tried to be. I have realized full well that its permanent operation of necessity depends upon the bank's ability to collect upon its mortgages and that it is vitally important to pay promptly, not only the interest but the principal, of the securities issued by the bank.

On the other hand, I am also interested in the welfare of the farmer-borrower. I do not believe that it will help these agricultural States to substitute another set of farmers for the ones who are already on the land and who are willing to do their best to carry on. I want to repeat what I stressed in my former letter that the interests of the borrowers and the bank are mutual.

Since writing you, Mr. ——— ———, secretary-treasurer of the farm-loan association, operating around ——— in ——— County, brought in some files of correspondence which I have had the opportunity to examine. I want to say frankly that I am very much disappointed in the attitude taken by some of the men representing the bank as disclosed by such correspondence. This is particularly true of one ——— ———, representing the collection department. I don't know Mr. ———. He is doubtless an able individual and probably a very fine fellow. I understand that he was employed by the bank on the theory that he is a good collector. If being unreasonable, unsympathetic, and hard-boiled constitutes ability as a collector, I believe he is entitled to the very highest possible rating. If the attitude assumed by him in the correspondence which I have examined is to become the policy of the land-bank system, I am convinced that no loaning agency which ever did business in this territory has ever found itself in such ill repute as the Federal land bank will be within a comparatively short time.

But so much for that. I picked at random three cases from Mr. ——— file, and I am going to take the liberty of referring to each of them, for I have tried to analyze them fairly. The comments I make are upon the assumption that the facts stated by

Mr. ——— in the letters to the bank are correct, for I have always found him absolutely truthful, and I consider his judgment good.

——— ———, LOAN 14,499, ——— ———

This land seems to be in good shape for next year's crop. The amount of the original loan has been cut down almost $1,000. If he sells all his wheat, he will realize approximately $55 above harvesting and threshing costs. A seed lien of $100 is unpaid. The amount of oats and barley raised during the year is obviously insufficient for feed to working horses and other stock. No mention need be made of necessary living expenses. In spite of these facts the bank demands retirement of amortization installment of $162.50, payment of the 1927 taxes, and a crop mortgage to cover, not only taxes and installments past due, but also the installments that will become due in 1932. That I regard such requirement unreasonable is putting the matter mildly, for no consideration seems to be given to the almost total crop failure existing there this year. The worst thing that could happen to ——— ——— and his creditors, including the Federal land bank, would be for him to sell his feed grain and apply the small proceeds that would be realized therefrom upon the installments due your bank. It would cripple his farming operations so that a reasonable income can not be expected next year. Statements contained in the treasurer's letter of September 23 would indicate that the demand is greater than might otherwise be the case for the reason that ——— ——— bank holds a subsequent lien upon the property. A similar thought prevails in other cases. I am personally astounded at these suggestions. Representatives of your bank in substance are demanding that the local bank supply the funds.

If Mr. ——— ——— does so, he is not only a poorer business man than I think he is, but I would unhesitatingly say that he would be treating the creditors of the bank most unfairly. His first obligation is to his depositors, and I regard it unjust for representatives of the Federal land bank to make demands which, if met, would unquestionably result in the closing of more of our local banks in this State and thus add to the present distress, as well as to make more difficult the ultimate collection of the money due you. The proposal to include installments not yet due in the chattel mortgage security has also seemed to me unfair. I do not criticize a request for security upon installments or taxes which are past due. If those can be paid out of next year's crop, not only the borrower but the bank would be doing very well in getting the loan back in pretty good shape.

On the whole, it strikes me that this is a loan as to which earnest consideration should be given to the suggestion to rewrite it on a new basis, including past-due installments in a new principal, thus amortizing it. The profit available in farming in one year can not possibly be sufficient to take care of several years' taxes and installments. Foreclosing the mortgage will not bring in funds with which to pay interest on the bonds but will add to the difficulties of your management.

In this case the methods which we expect to find in a cheap, irresponsible collection agency with no standing are employed, as shown by the 7-day notice in the letter of October 14. The first unpaid instalment matured December 27, 1930. Two years' taxes are unpaid. While a smaller proportion of the original loan has been retired than in the case immediately preceding, the land has been considerably improved since it was purchased and is in good shape for next year. The owner is conservative, not even owning a car. Wheat raised on the farm would probably not amount to $100 after the threshing and twine bill is paid. The buildings secured with you naturally require protection against loss by fire, and the premium will amount to $26. Your bank suggests that he pay up defaults amounting to $381.54. How can he possibly obtain any such amount unless he goes out and steals it? Here, too, the bank is fully as much interested in retaining the feed on the farm as is the borrower. Any requirement that he pay more than one installment or the past-due taxes seems impossible of performance unless you expect the Adams bank to advance the money and thus prejudice the rights of its depositors. This would fully account for the proceeds of the wheat raised on the farm, but I presume he could locate seed wheat somewhere else.

Here again your competent and efficient collector suggests that the sale of the wheat, "together with the oats and barley," raised on this farm would retire the September 13, 1930, installment and make a substantial payment on the 1928 taxes. Possibly he has never seen a farm so that he may not know that the horses required to operate it next year will need considerably more than 200 bushels of oats and 200 bushels of barley if they are to do the work required in taking care of next year's crop. An arbitrary demand that feed in this amount be sold is positively asinine unless you want the farm to lie idle next year and take title at the earliest possible opportunity. With a farmer willing to carry on, would you not be in a much better position next year by accepting the proceeds that will be realized on the sale of the wheat and apply them either to past due installments or to taxes as you prefer, and thus insure that the land be properly farmed? The same comment as made in one of the former cases to a similar situation applies to the proposal that the crop mortgage next year include taxes and installments that aren't as yet due.

I concede that my ire has become aroused over these cases, which are simply typical of others that have been called to my attention, not only in the Adams Association but elsewhere as well. I am not attempting to run a bluff. I believe I am as earnestly interested in the success of the land-bank system as any person employed in it. I am not taking the matter up with the board at Washington or anyone else. I do, however, want you to know that unless some sympathetic consideration is given to cases of this sort I intend to do so. In fact, I will go further. As soon as Congress convenes I shall ask for sufficient time to discuss the matter on the floor of the House and let the country judge the facts. I don't want to do this, and I hope it will be unnecessary.

Since my last letter I have discussed these questions with men who are conservative and in whose business judgment I have confidence. I have become more and more convinced that the best plan of all would be to renew many of the loans and thus amortize them on a new basis. This is often done in the case of building and loan associations and works out very well. Of course, I do not intend that this procedure should be adopted in all cases or in any case where there is no greater amount in default than what the borrower can reasonably be expected to retire in the event of a good crop. Indiscriminate foreclosures will dry up your income more surely than any other method that I can think of, to say nothing about the hardships that will accrue to the borrowers and their families.

Very respectfully yours,

O. B. BURTNESS.

It is a pleasure to report that I had an interview with Mr. Klawon, president of the St. Paul bank; Mr. Rask, one of its board of directors; and with Mr. Madison, a member of the Federal Land Bank Board at St. Paul, on my way to Washington. I left that interview well satisfied. I was convinced a more liberal treatment would be extended to needy borrowers in default.

Mr. Madison, Mr. Klawon, and others had spent several days in the field. It was refreshing to note a board member coming from Washington was sufficiently interested to do this. I found him sympathetic and practical. There is no question that the policy of the board here in Washington has been much moderated. This has permitted the officials of the local banks to use their discretion more wisely, something which I doubted they were permitted to do some months ago.

The system has been controlled too much from above. Local bank officials know more about the conditions in their territory than the board in Washington. I am hopeful that the recent liberalization will inure to the benefit of all concerned.

Instead of numerous complaints in the mail some weeks ago, I have recently received letters from local secretary-treasurers and others indicating approval of settlements now being made. I, therefore, commend every official who has had any part in bringing this about.

This result is in harmony with the desire of the President of the United States who, I know, is anxious that no family be forced to leave its farm home under foreclosure of mortgage where the borrower does the best he can to carry on.

Mr. HARE. I congratulate the Committee on Banking and Currency in presenting this bill. I congratulate the administration upon its change of mind during the past 12 months; for, as the chairman of the committee has said, an effort was made last year to present a bill similar to this. I might go further and say that an effort was made two years ago, when I introduced a similar bill for the benefit of the farm mortgagors of this country. At that time we were unable to secure the indorsement and approval of the Secretary of the Treasury or the Federal Farm Loan Board, but we are glad there has been a change of mind on the part of the administration leaders. However, I am not misled in the belief that this bill is going to be of much value to the farmers, for it has been my observation that whenever Congress passes a law leaving its execution within the "discretion" of some governmental agency very little if anything is ever done. I have some apprehension about those charged with the responsibility of enforcing this law doing anything different from what they have done in the past. In other words, if the Farm Board, if the Secretary of the Treasury, has had the right and authority heretofore to extend the time of amortization installments or to extend the time for payment of farm mortgages, and they have refused to do it, how can we expect them to be more considerate in the future than they have in the past?

Some will say that the Federal land banks could not extend the time heretofore because it was necessary to have money to pay the interest on the bonds. They say now, "We are going to appropriate $100,000,000 for this purpose." I take the position that that authority exists and has existed all these years the Federal land bank system has been in operation. Section 32 of the original act not only gives authority to the Secretary of the Treasury, but he is directed to make loans to the directors of any Federal land bank upon request sufficient to pay the interest on outstanding bonds where the interest on the mortgages has not been paid. What more does this bill contain? Let me read section 32:

> The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, upon the request of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to make deposit for the temporary use of any Federal land bank out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

It provides further that—

> The aggregate of all sums so deposited by the Secretary of the Treasury shall not exceed the sum of $6,000,000.

Heretofore if the president of any Federal land bank found himself in a position where it was necessary to extend the amortization payment on mortgages held by that bank, and would ask the Secretary for money with which to pay the interest on those bonds, the Secretary, within his discretion, had a right to do it. Has he done it? No. Will he do it in the future? I say no. I judge a tree by its fruits, and I judge a man's actions in the future by those of the past.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. LEAVITT. Is there not a difference in the two authorities? As I understood the reading of this section of the existing law, there is authority there for the Secretary of the Treasury to make deposits in those banks. In the proposed act now under consideration the Secretary of the Treasury is to be authorized and directed to take out and pay for shares having an aggregate par value of so much.

Mr. HARE. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, because it raises the one suspicion I have about this bill. The $100,000,000 authorized will be taken in stock, and it will be used largely in making the outstanding bonds more secure and will give but little consideration to those who may want to obtain loans, or in extending the time for payment of installments of those who have already obtained loans.

Mr. LEAVITT. But it is a different procedure.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARE. There is this difference. The $100,000,000 called for in this bill is nothing more in effect than that provided for in section 32 of the original act. In that act it says "Aggregate sums so deposited by the Secretary of the Treasury shall not exceed the sum of $6,000,000." This $6,000,000 may be used in paying the interest on outstanding bonds. The $6,000,000 is simply the interest on $100,000,000. So, if we take the $100,000,000, and the most of it is used to increase the capital of the banks, it will be no more than that provided under the existing law to meet the interest on outstanding bonds issued by such banks.

You will understand I am going to support this bill, but the execution of it is left too much to the discretion of the Farm Loan Board to expect the farmers to get that consideration I feel they are entitled to. You will observe that the suspension of payments that may be due by farmers is wholly within the discretion of the directors, which means that it will be in the discretion of the Farm Loan Board and the Secretary of the Treasury; and when you leave it to those three to exercise separate discretions I see but very little help for the farmers of the country in this bill, but it is the only thing the committee has seen fit to bring us, and I am going to support it, hoping that those charged with the responsibility of executing the law will exercise that discretion in favor of agriculture.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield for a further question on that same point?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. As I understand the gentleman, he says that under the existing law they could deposit $6,000,000. Under this act the Secretary of the Treasury is to be authorized to take out and pay for shares having an aggregate par value of $100,000,000. In the one case the banks would have $6,000,000 to use and in the other case they would have $100,000,000 to use. There is at least that much difference, is there not, between the two bills?

Mr. HARE. They will have whatever amount is necessary to pay the outstanding bonds.

Mr. LEAVITT. The difference between $6,000,000 and $100,000,000 is very considerable in meeting the present situation.

Mr. HARE. That is right; but if the directors use the $100,000,000 to increase their capital stock, and it is wholly within their discretion, where will the delinquent farmers get any help out of this bill?

In so far as the amount of money involved in the original act and the proposed law, there is a decided difference, but in so far as applying these funds to alleviate the distress among farmers who have borrowed money from the land banks there is but little or no difference, because the original act gives the Secretary of the Treasury, the Farm Loan Board, and the banks the right and authority, within their "discretion," to suspend payments of the amortization installments, and that is all this bill does in so far as assisting the borrower who may be unable to meet his installments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has again expired.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

On the passage of this bill, ladies and gentlemen, the Members of this House who have said they are going back home pleased to tell the farmers in their communities how much Congress has done for them, can go and tell their farmer constituents that under the provisions of this bill, if they make default to-day, their payment due to-day will be added to the interest and principal due a year hence, for both will then be due and payable unless the officials of the bank show them special consideration and split the defaulted payment into five equal payments at 8 per cent interest.

They can tell those farmers that next year they will pay the amount then due and on top of that they will pay either the full amount that they failed to pay this year, or one-fifth, or one-third, or one-fourth of it, in the discretion of the officials. Personally, I do not believe your farmers and mine want such a suspension as is contemplated in this bill. The load is lifted from their shoulders to-day and a double load placed on their backs next year. I am against such a performance. If we intend to help them in this bill, let us do so in a real tangible way, in a helpful way.

Most men who represent farmers in this House believe this bill will apply to all that is due next year, and in addition to that, possibly all that was due this year; and, if the ordinary farmer counts that a suspension, and if the ordinary Member of Congress figures that the farmers are being helped by this bill, I will say they are going to be mightily disappointed. This bill is a bankers' bill. This bill is to make the bonds worth 100 cents on the dollar. This bill is a sop to the American farmer in its present form, absolutely a sop, and nothing more.

If you want to help the farmers, protect them against foreclosure. And how can you do that? You can place at the end of the amortization period this defaulted payment. If the amortization period is 32 years and he has paid in 17, it will mean that at the end of 15 years more he will have to pay one more installment; the installment he failed to pay this year or next year, instead of doubling up both payments the next due date. Is anybody going to be hurt by that? Will not the bonds be protected equally as well as under this plan? I say they will.

We hear gentlemen on both sides talking about the suffering of the farmers now in the way of foreclosures, but those gentlemen in many cases refer to the joint-stock land banks and not to the farmers who have mortgaged their farms under the legislation here under consideration, and under this bill they will get no relief whatsoever. We have got to bring in another bill, a bill having to do with joint-stock land banks, and if the bill that is brought in by the Banking and Currency Committee for the joint-stock land banks is no better than this bill, then a great many farmers will have to cool their heels outside the poorhouses in the United States within the next five years.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This is all the President will give us. He will not sign anything else.

Mr. ARENTZ. How do we know what the President intends to do when an amended bill comes before him? I am here to legislate for the people. We are the legislators here, not rubber stamps. I will stand with any group of men who will offer to give the farmer something under this bill, regardless of whether the President wants it or not. The Members are saying that this is all we can get. Let some Member offer amendments and see how many will back him up. Do we have to let it go over to the Senate to have this bill put in proper shape? Often the Senate has its ear closer to the ground than Members of the House, yet in reality we too have soft hearts for those in distress and the folks back on the farms of America whom we are supposed to help to-day should receive our profoundest consideration. Let us fix up the bill here and now so the Senate will find it unnecessary to change a word.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a letter from the Joint Stock Land Bank of San Francisco.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nevada asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

(The letter referred to follows:)

PACIFIC COAST JOINT-STOCK LAND BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO, San Francisco, Calif., December 14, 1931.

Hon. SAMUEL S. ARENTZ,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ARENTZ: With the existing deplorable condition of agriculture throughout the country many bills looking toward an immediate improvement in this situation will undoubtedly be introduced when Congress convenes. As an investor in stocks of a number of joint-stock land banks, I am vitally interested in the future welfare of these institutions and all legislation affecting farm conditions generally. My experience in operating these banks has proven conclusively that many farmers who have devoted their lives to agriculture can not possibly hope to meet mortgage interest and taxes with existing prices for farm commodities. Since these prices are affected by world conditions, it is my judgment that we must reduce the interest and tax burden of the farmers and amortize the principal portion of their existing loans over a longer period of years if their present condition is to be improved.

My plan is to have the Government organize a Federal merger bank, take over all of the assets of all Federal and joint-stock land banks, and issue 50-year bonds guaranteed by the Government bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent in exchange for all bonds now outstanding of either Federal or joint-stock land banks. This new merger bank can then rewrite all existing mortgages payable to Federal and joint-stock land banks on a 50-year amortization plan with a 4½ per cent interest rate. This will reduce the existing amortization payments from $86.52 per $1,000 per annum on present 20-year plan to $51.92 per $1,000 per annum on 50-year plan, thus saving to the farmer $34.60 per $1,000 per annum. This saving will pay all the taxes of the average farmer. It will also give a spread of 1½ per cent as an operating profit for a new bank and would be sufficient to create necessary reserves and afford a very satisfactory profit on capital investment.

Reports issued by the Farm Loan Board indicate that both Federal and joint-stock land banks are foreclosing on an increasingly large number of farmers each 3-month period. Many farmers, who have been successful in their respective localities for years, can not under existing conditions meet their amortization payments and are faced with almost certain foreclosure unless some relief is provided promptly. It is my opinion that a long-term amortization loan at a lower rate of interest will save the homes of many of these deserving farmers.

Foreclosed properties could be retained by the merger bank until improved commodity prices justified placing additional lands on the market and marginal lands could likewise be kept off production by leasing for grazing or reforestation purposes.

Short-term farm loans, now frozen in country banks throughout the United States, could likewise be refunded under this 50-year plan and new Government obligations issued to provide funds for such loans.

When bonds of Federal and joint-stock land banks were sold to the public they were sold as instrumentalities of the Government of the United States and as such millions of dollars worth were placed in the hands of widows and guardians of orphans throughout the land. It is these same widows and orphans who are to-day taking the losses on bonds that are of necessity sold at present depressed prices. If the merger-bank plan should be enacted into law the Government would be assuming an actual responsibility for the bonds, for which it now already has at least a strong moral obligation, and the holders of these bonds would be immediately assured of at least an ultimate return of their principal investment.

If the merger bank is put into effect new funds would become immediately available for loaning purposes throughout the country.

Briefly such a bill—

Will afford constructive and beneficial relief to the farmer;

Will protect the unfortunate bondholders who purchased their bonds under a misapprehension and in many cases misrepresentation of the real facts;

Will save the stockholders who now stand to lose double the amount of their original investment;

Will enable the Government to come forth and assume the responsibility of its tax-exempt instrumentalities that made possible the present plight of the farmer, the bondholder, and the stockholder.

If my own experience or that of my organization can be utilized by yourself in any way in connection with the solution of the present farm problems, I want you to know that I am ready to cooperate with you in every possible manner.

Very sincerely yours,

A. O. STEWART, President.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I rise principally to caution my side of the House as to this constant reiteration from the Republican side about "cooperation" and "nonpartisanship." I believe that history will record that the party on the other side of the aisle have only "cooperated" or talked about nonpartisanship when they were in the minority. [Applause.] If this bill is an example of "cooperation," then it is "in reverse," because this particular bill, when the other side was in the majority, could not be pried out of committee. Now, however, when the "only party fit to rule" is out of power it suggests we cooperate. In this particular instance we do not happen to need their cooperation in bringing out a distinctly Democratic measure which they smothered for a year.

Only the other day we voted $120,000 for Federal employment agencies, based on a plan and a system identical with the Wagner bill which the President stuffed in his pocket and vetoed at the close of the last session. Oh, there has been quite a turnabout of events!

Let us at least be fair, sincere about cooperation, and nonpartisanship, if you really want any of it. If "cooperation" is necessary, you on the Republican side must cooperate. I am one of those from the great industrial East who have been pleased to vote for every farm-relief measure which has come before this House for many years. We voted for the McNary-Haugen bill and many other measures to relieve the farmer.

I rose to-day and asked the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER], who was then talking about the low level of commodity prices, if he did not realize that the level of the purchasing power of the consumer had also fallen. For every farmer in this country there are thousands of consumers. The consumer does not want low prices. We realize that a return of prosperity must necessarily be accompanied by higher commodity prices. In the disastrous days of 1892 to 1896 prosperity returned only when the level of commodity prices had raised so that the producers could make a fair profit.

The consumer is perfectly willing to pay fair prices if his earnings will permit it. But the truth is that in 1929 the average mechanic was getting $40 or $50 a week when now millions are anxious to get some sort of employment even at $2 a day. Through necessity alone he must be furnished with lower prices. If you will give back to the people their wage scale, they will willingly buy your commodities and pay a fair price, and a price that will mean a profit to everybody.

This bill provides relief with respect to mortgages on farms, and we of the cities are for that. Everyone who has spoken here to-day has called it a "farm-relief" measure. Nobody here has spoken to-day about the consumer. We have wept over the mortgage on the farm, but the people in the great industrial centers have to live in houses, too. They have to have homes, and for every mortgage being foreclosed on a farm I will wager there are four or five being foreclosed on the homes of the men who go out at 7 o'clock into a factory and come to their little homes at night.

This is a situation not to be overlooked. I understand part of the program of this Congress will include some measure of relief in this respect as to relief to owners of homes other than farmers, and I hope there will be just as enthusiastic support of such a measure as I am giving in support of this farm-relief measure. [Applause.]

I did not want the impression to be created, because of my colloquy with the gentleman from Iowa, that I was concerned only with the interests of the consumer. We have millions of people out of employment. We have hundreds of thousands of homes being foreclosed. We know the large centers of population have struggled for years to get the Republican Party to look at the Nation at large. As I have said before on this floor, they have for years catered to the rural Republican strongholds only—this when there were such places. There are few of them left now. [Laughter.] If the Republican Party could have acquired a national complex, our country would not be in the position it is to-day.

Let me give credit to the Democratic side of the House that you have been concerned, as you have evidenced in the relief bills of last year, about the interests of the people of the entire Nation. We from the East only ask that the Republican side of the House "cooperate" with the millions of wage earners of America. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this bill (H. R. 6172), of course, has two purposes. First, it is intended to give relief to the farmers who are in default by reason of inability to meet their installment payments; and, second, to bring the Federal land-bank bonds back to par. Everybody must recognize that when the bonds are selling below par the land banks can not continue to make loans or grant extensions, as the banks are not authorized to dispose of bonds below par. Such bonds have been below par for some time, with the result that the banks have found it impossible to carry out the purpose for which they were created. In order to make the bonds marketable at par, the interest rate would have to be increased to a point which would make the rate to farmer-borrowers prohibitive.

I think one of the fundamental errors in the bill is that section 4 does not go as far as it ought to go in extending relief to the American farmer.

It must not be forgotten that perhaps nine-tenths of those who need relief are farmers who have already carried their loans for anywhere from five to a dozen years, and who have met their installments every year. This means that their loans to-day are in very much better condition as to security than when originally made. I think relief should be granted at least to the extent of permitting the installment upon which an extension is asked to go over to the tail end of the loan period, and that the farmer should be required only to pay the interest thereon annually in connection with his annual installments upon the remaining deferred payments. If this were done, it would be real relief to the farmers. This will not jeopardize the loan in the least degree because, even if it were done, the loan would still remain smaller in amount than when it was made in the first instance.

The difficulty with the provision carried in section 4 is that the farmer will have to begin to make up the extended installment payment the year following the extension, when conditions may not be any better than they were when extension was made, and he may find himself in a position where it is utterly impossible to protect his farm, whereas if the installments upon which an extension is asked could be extended to the end of the loan period and made a part of the principal for all practical purposes, so far as payment is concerned, with only interest upon the installment to be paid annually, then the farmer would secure relief that would be worth something to him.

This is all I care to say about this provision. I realize that no amendment I might offer or that may be offered by anyone else upon the floor will have any chance of going through unless sanctioned by members of the committee in charge of the bill, but I do hope the bill will be amended in line with my suggestion before it becomes law.

If I may now have the attention of the distinguished and able gentleman who has recently become chairman of the committee, I would like to ask him one question with reference to section 4 of the bill.

Section 4 allows the extension of payments for repayment by installments spread over a 5-year period. Do such extended payments carry the delinquent rate on the deferred installments or the rate provided for in the original mortgage?

Mr. STEAGALL. The regular rate provided for in the original mortgage.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I have taken the floor to ask information. I am not going to try to make a Saturday afternoon speech. What is the total aggregate amount of the delinquency in the farm loan system at the present time?

Mr. STEVENSON. The actual delinquency from one day to two years amounts to 22 per cent of the loans. The actual delinquency that are over 30 days' delinquency amount to 11 per cent.

Mr. JONES. I am not talking about percentages. I want to know the total aggregate amount in dollars.

Mr. STEVENSON. One billion one hundred and seventy-four million dollars is the amount of the loans.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but all those are not delinquent and are not due. Many of them run for a considerable period of years. I want to know the total amount necessary to expend to take care of all delinquents. I am informed that about $84,000,000 represents the annual installments being paid at the present time, or rather half that amount twice per year.

Mr. STEVENSON. As I understand it, there are only about $40,000,000 in semiannual installments.

Mr. PATTERSON. I had a letter from the Federal Farm Loan Board a few days ago saying that the total amount of the installments due annually is approximately $84,000,000.

Mr. JONES. That is the total amount per year and there is a delinquency of about 22 per cent of that of the semiannual payments?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Then there is about $10,000,000 of delinquency.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is right.

Mr. JONES. And if the same percentage should become delinquent in the January payments that would not increase it more than $5,000,000?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is a matter of arithmetic.

Mr. JONES. If we are going to appropriate $100,000,000 for these banks, and all of us have the main purpose of taking care of the present foreclosures on these home owners, does not the gentleman think that we could allocate, say, 20 per cent of the moneys that we are advancing to these banks, and say to them, "You shall extend these payments"? [Applause.] It seems to me that if we are going to take $100,000,000 out of the Treasury and advance it to these banks, we could make this general provision that covers past-due installments, and make them cover the January 1 installments, because it will probably be that time before this act becomes effective, and direct each official of the farm-loan bank to extend these installments—in other words, use one-fifth of the fund to either put these delinquencies over to the end of the other installments or spread them over five years, to save these American homes from foreclosure.

I do not believe much in this character of legislation generally, but this is an extraordinary emergency. Of course, this is a temporary matter. Our troubles lie deeper than this. Ultimately the purchasing power of agriculture must be restored if the Nation is to prosper. In other words, the discriminations against agriculture must be removed.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. How would the banks pay the interest on the bonds, if they do not collect interest from the farmers?

Mr. JONES. It seems to me that if they are advanced $80,000,000, and still can not pay the interest on the bonds, they are in pretty bad shape.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. This is going to be capital stock

Mr. JONES. I understand, but it is going to be fresh money and should certainly assist them in handling their affairs. Otherwise why appropriate it? Besides, I am endeavoring to use a portion of these funds for such installments.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Following the suggestion of the gentleman from Kansas, how can you use your capital stock to pay past interest?

Mr. JONES. I am advocating that a portion of the fund be allocated to these payments and the balance of it used as capital stock. I believe the best way is the plan which several others, including myself, introduced to authorize an independent appropriation through another department to take up these installments and place them behind these loans, thus letting the Federal land banks get their money and the farmers save their homes.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. If $20,000,000 is loaned by the system for the farmers to use in paying the interest back to the system, why would not the system get the $20,000,000 to use in the payment of interest on bonds?

Mr. JONES. This will be paid back, and all these sums will be paid back, if the system succeeds as I think it will.

Mr. PARSONS. Has it been brought out here how many million dollars worth of farm lands have been foreclosed on and are now in the hands of the Government or under process of liquidation?

Mr. JONES. I will refer that question to some member of the committee. I would rather the gentleman asked some member of the committee.

Mr. PARSONS. I wanted the gentleman to ask that inasmuch as he was already getting information.

Mr. JONES. I would be glad if any member of the committee would furnish that information. Undoubtedly, there have been foreclosures.

I would like to have this further information. That is the only reason I asked for an extension of my time. I would like to ask if this amendment which you have placed on the bill providing for extensions, in the discretion of the banks, was submitted to the members of the Farm Board, and did they show a sympathetic attitude toward the administration of it?

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say that various provisions which have tended to accomplish what we seek to accomplish by section 4 of this bill were under consideration at various times in the committee and members of the Farm Loan Board discussed that last year in connection with a bill that I introduced at that time. And they discussed it again in connection with the bill before the House at this time. But, to answer the gentleman specifically, the Federal Farm Loan Board does not want any additional provisions in the Federal farm loan act dealing with the matter of foreclosures.

Mr. JONES. That is what I suspected. Will they sympathetically administer the proposal if we put it in there, making it purely discretionary?

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman has as much knowledge about that as I have. They say they have been administering it sympathetically all the time. I can hardly agree to that. I wish to be moderate in my language, but I have not thought that they did.

Mr. JONES. I appreciate the fine work which the gentleman and the members of the committee have done. They have a delicate situation to handle. I appreciate also the difficulties of the board. But the farmer, too, is having his difficulties.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, this bill to liberalize the Federal land bank law is a valuable piece of legislation. I want to commend the chairman and members of the committee for bringing it before us at this time. However, it does not wholly meet the situation.

There will be an amendment offered later, and I want now to invite your attention to that amendment. What does section 4, as it appears in the bill, propose to do? It proposes to relieve the farmer of payment for one year, but it also says that next year the farmer must make his regular payment and 20 per cent more; that is, 20 per cent of the delayed payment in addition to the regular annual payment then due.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. It does not say that they shall not extend his payment if he is unable to pay it next year. It does not say that they shall not extend that. They have the same power. It is a permanent provision which gives them power to extend any payment at any time where the conditions justify it.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. But I think in practical effect it will mean what I have said. We all know, with the present outlook of agriculture, that this bill will not provide the necessary relief. While we are trying to meet a serious situation we ought to meet it in a more effectual way than we are doing under section 4.

THE REAL CONDITIONS

What is the situation? There are hundreds of thousands of farmers that this bill will affect who are questioning at this joyous Christmas time whether they will be able to make their payments or whether they will lose their homes. It will also affect investors in these bonds. Is it better that we help the man who owns the farm, who has an interest in the farm, who has been there perhaps 15 or 25 years? Is it better to leave him on the farm, understanding the land as he does and knowing how to manage it to best advantage, there to work out his salvation and make the payments to the Federal land bank, or is it better to foreclose and force that man and his family out among the unemployed and put some one else, who knows nothing about that particular farm, on the land? That is the practical question that we face to-day. So when the amendment is offered later to section 4 by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ] I hope you Members from East and West will give it very, very careful consideration. I appreciate that the interest on these bonds must be paid. I am interested in the entire system. I am interested in the farmer, in the man who puts his money in the bonds, and in the perpetuity of the land-bank system.

I believe every man should pay his honest debts. But I also believe the honest old farmer should have a chance to get his breath and save his home.

Section 4 now reads:

> Each Federal land bank is authorized, when in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, to extend, in whole or in part, any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid, and to accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments during a period of five years or less thereafter, to be paid in equal amounts in addition to the regular installments to become due during such period.

That will help some. However, there is a better way of working out the problem. One that will be more advantageous to the farmer and will not injure the holder of the land-bank bonds and will not suspend public works of any kind. The Arentz amendment, which I am advocating, would transfer the amount due this year to the end of the obligation and thus give the real relief the farmer needs.

Even on the foreign moratorium, which you gentlemen voted yesterday, you gave 10 years, without question. Here you are giving at most five years and perhaps less, with a question always hanging over the farmer as to whether he has the full five years or whether he may have to pay before five years. Certainly we can not do less for our own people to-day than you did for the people of foreign nations yesterday.

I did not vote for the moratorium. I coupled with my sanction of it last summer the distinct and definite provision that a limitation of armaments should go along with it. No reductions in armaments have been made. I kept faith with the President, with myself, and with my constituents in voting against it. But you who did vote for it voted to give foreign peoples the distribution of this year's debt over 10 years unquestionably. Here you are giving our own farmer at most five years, and we find a broadax hanging over his neck at all times. There is a better way to solve this problem. I want you to think seriously when the amendment is offered and I want you to give it the favorable action to which in your hearts you know it is entitled.

If we can not secure the adoption of this amendment in the House, then I shall hope to secure its adoption in the Senate.

The homes of thousands of hard-working farmers are in jeopardy. Many in their declining years are losing the farms on which they have lived and reared their families. Let us amend this bill and make it a real farm relief measure. Now that we are providing for the holders of these bonds, let us also lift the farmers' burden at least for one year from those who need it.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. Is a motion to close debate in order at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. DYER. Of course, I will not offer such a motion.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL]?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, apparently I am in the attitude of many other Members. I shall vote for this bill if I do not get an opportunity to vote for a better bill. I am not satisfied with this bill by any means. However, I shall vote for it under the hope that it holds out some promise of relief to the farmers in their distress.

I want to observe that it comes in poor grace, as it seems to me, for Members on the Republican side to criticize this bill because it is not liberal enough to the farmers, in view of the fact that when they were in power they refused to give consideration to any measure along this line. [Applause.] During the last Congress many of us advocated a measure designed to grant an extension to the farmers holding loans in the Federal land banks.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to give the gentleman the information he asked me about a while ago which I did not have at the time, and that was the amount of real estate which had been foreclosed upon and was now owned by the banks. Twenty-eight million two hundred and seventy-four thousand six hundred and one dollars is the amount of real estate that has been foreclosed upon, on mortgage loans of $1,177,521,000.

Mr. DAVIS. I am glad to get that information. I wish to further observe that if a measure even of this character had been enacted during the last Congress when many of us, including the present chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, advocated such a measure, it would have rendered infinitely more relief than it can render now, because since that time farms throughout the country have been foreclosed upon. In my section the Federal land banks have been more relentless than have the private companies holding mortgages on farms. They have sold farm after farm, the best farms in the country and owned by some of the best people, after they had gone through the worst drought in history and after they had gone through more than a year of the worst financial depression in history. So they would have certainly been better off and those who are still hanging on would have been relieved to a very much greater extent a year ago than they will now, when they are, in most instances, in such shape that the very small relief afforded in this measure will not save a vast number of them, even if this bill is generously and sympathetically administered. In view of the attitude of the board in the past, I want to say that I have but little hope that they will in the future manifest anything like a sympathetic attitude.

I know that there are on the Banking and Currency Committee some genuine friends of the farmers, and I regret that they yielded their opinion in a spirit of compromise. I wish they had brought upon this floor a measure that would afford real relief and let the Members in this House and at the other end of the Capitol who want to do so vote against it and let the President veto it if he wants to do so. [Applause.] I believe there are enough Members in the Congress who are really sympathetic with the distressful condition of agriculture who would vote to pass a real farm relief measure over a presidential veto when they have shown such a generous attitude toward everybody else in the world, both here and abroad. Congress has just passed a resolution authorizing the postponement of $252,000,000 payable to the United States from foreign governments in the form of interest on loans extended to them and authorizing the repayment over a 10-year period, beginning July 1, 1933. I voted against this bill, as I think it is high time for the United States to quit playing Santa Claus to foreign nations and to do more for the relief of our own citizens. However, the moratorium resolution passed both branches of Congress by an overwhelming majority. It is difficult to conceive that these same Members would refuse to pass a bill over a presidential veto, which is sufficiently specific to insure an extension for at least a year of farm loans made through the Federal land banks in order to prevent the foreclosure of such loans, in view of the deplorable and distressful condition of those engaged in agriculture.

We Members should do our duty by passing a bill that will really be effective. The pending bill merely authorizes a brief and partial extension of loans. In view of the fact that the Federal Farm Loan Board insists, as I am advised, that they have been showing a lenient attitude, and in view of the expressed attitude of the officials of the Federal land banks, I very much fear that the bill in its present form will provide but little, if any, relief.

In my opinion, this bill should be so amended as to direct the Federal land banks to extend loans where it appears that the borrowers are unable to pay. Some of my colleagues have prepared amendments along this line, which I shall cheerfully support.

Furthermore, this bill should also be amended so as to provide for an extension of such loans for a period of one year beyond the date of the last regular installment payable under such mortgage, and I have prepared and shall offer an amendment to that effect. This would give the borrower a year's breathing spell. The bill in its present form only authorizes the extension of an installment or installments, in whole or in part, to be paid in equal amounts during a period of five years or less thereafter.

The Prime Minister of the government of Ontario has demonstrated that where there is a will there is a way to help the people in distress. The Prime Minister has directed the provincial agricultural development board not to foreclose on farm mortgages under any circumstances. He also urged all private mortgage companies to take similar action and has warned them that if they fail to do so he would ask for the necessary legislation to enforce such action.

The President has made recommendations designed to relieve the banks, the railroads, and other industries in their distress. Let us do simple justice to those engaged in agriculture. It would be doing but little to pass a bill that would really insure a year's moratorium upon farm loans in the Federal land banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the banks have taken over so many farms by foreclosure that they are now advertising them for sale by printed advertisements. I ask permission to attach to my remarks a copy of one of those advertisements offering foreclosed farms for sale.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADVERTISEMENT OF FEDERAL LAND BANKS

Form 903 11-31 20M

BUY NOW

The Federal Land Bank of Houston and several of the national farm loan associations have on hand a number of farms in various parts of Texas for sale at attractive prices and terms. These farms have been acquired because some borrowers could not pay and a change of ownership was necessary to protect the interests of the bank and the association.

We are now selling an average of one farm every other day, and more inquiries from prospective buyers are reaching the bank each day.

There is every reason to believe that land prices have now reached the bottom. This is a good time for the careful investor to buy farms.

If you want to purchase additional farm land, answer the questions on the reverse side and return to us. If you have a son or daughter whom you want to assist in purchasing a farm home, fill out and return the questionnaire. If you have a neighbor, friend, or relative whom you think will buy, fill out the questionnaire and return. We will give it careful attention and forward full information.

We thank you in advance for this cooperation.

* * * * * * *

DID YOU EVER STOP TO THINK that the farmer who has conserved soil and water by terracing his farm and has practiced crop rotation and has milk cows, pigs, poultry, garden, and orchard, makes his payments promptly and is seldom in financial distress?

If you have not terraced, why not start your farm prosperity program by terracing your farm now?

THE FEDERAL LAND BANK OF HOUSTON.

Mr. BLANTON. In the last session of this Congress numerous Members, including myself, had resolutions and bills before this same committee to grant some relief to farmers, especially in areas where there had been three successive drought failures. We could get no relief whatever. When we first presented that matter to the Banking and Currency Committee every member of the committee was sympathetic toward such legislation until the administration sent its emissaries there and cooked the goose of that legislation, stopped it, and nothing was done.

I am in favor of adopting the amendment suggested by my colleague from Texas [Mr. JONES], which will require and making it mandatory that at least $25,000,000 of this money shall be used to grant relief to farmers whose farms are being foreclosed. I had in my resolution last year, and I have in my present resolution before this committee, a provision to redeem farms that have already been foreclosed, farms that have been taken away from the farmers, in some instances because of the nonpayment of amounts which did not represent over one-tenth or one-fifteenth of the actual value of the farm. Under such conditions those farms have been taken away from the farmers and sold under foreclosure proceedings. We ought to make some provision for the redemption of those farms.

Mr. Chairman, in connection with my remarks I ask unanimous consent to insert a copy of the resolution I have introduced and which is now pending before this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up any more time, but I do hope there will be a mandatory amendment placed on this bill and I shall support it. The copy of my resolution (H. J. Res. 79), which on December 8, 1931, I introduced in the House, and which was ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, is as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing and directing Federal land banks to suspend and withhold foreclosure of mortgages until December 31, 1932, where farmers are unable to make payment of interest or principal due, and to provide for redemption of any such lands foreclosed since April 1, 1930

Whereas it was the intent and purpose of Congress when passing the Federal farm loan act in July, 1916, to aid and protect farmers in times of distress and not to ruin and rob them of their farms; and

Whereas when creating Federal land banks Congress provided that if the initial $750,000 capital required for every Federal land bank was not subscribed within 30 days the Secretary of the Treasury should subscribe for it on behalf of the United States; that all salaries and expenses of the Federal Farm Loan Board supervising such banks be paid annually by the Government; that such banks be national depositaries; that the capital, reserve, surplus, and income of every Federal land bank be exempt from all taxes, Federal, State, municipal, and local; that the mortgages and bonds of said banks shall be deemed and held to be instrumentalities of the Government of the United States; that the bonds of said banks shall be a lawful investment for all fiduciary and trust funds, and may be accepted as security for all public deposits; and other subsidies were extended to said Federal land banks by the Government to enable them to grant special aid and protection to distressed farmers; and

Whereas certain portions of the agricultural sections of the United States have been inflicted with prolonged and continued droughts, and with unprecedented low prices for farm products, making it impossible for certain farmers who are borrowers from the Federal land banks to meet the interest and other maturities on their loans; and

Whereas the Federal land banks have harshly adopted the policy of granting no extensions regardless of circumstances, and illustrative of such policy the Federal Land Bank of Houston, Tex., one of the 12 such banks authorized and created by Congress, in its booklet distributed to its 56,767 farmers who have borrowed $151,600,000, entitled "Why the Federal Land Bank Can Grant No Extensions," has cold-bloodedly announced:

"All borrowers should understand that it is a waste of time to ask for extensions. If one can not pay, then he should sell his farm to one who can and will";

and asserting further in such booklet that the Federal land bank is not a Government institution, and that this bank at Houston had then already foreclosed 124 farms, and that its associations had then already foreclosed 320 other farms in Texas; and

Whereas said Houston bank in August, 1930, notified Effie May Wilson, of Rotan, Tex., a poor woman with an invalid husband, who had suffered three successive crop failures, that unless her interest payment of $68 was paid immediately with 8 per cent penalty interest foreclosure of her farm would ensue, thus forcing her to sacrifice her work stock, family milch cows, and laying hens at one-third their value; and said bank notified Mrs. O. A. Roberson, a poor widow of Caps, Tex., that she must pay her $101 interest at once, "even though it becomes necessary that you sell your place to get the money," or her 121-acre farm would be foreclosed, and her work stock and milch cows were already mortgaged to a local bank for supplies, and she was thus threatened with the loss of her farm, worth over twice the amount of the mortgage against it, but which could not be sold because of said general depression; and that when these specific cases were brought to the attention of said bank, President Gossett replied that it was his intention to foreclose against the 11,666 farms in the drought area of Texas if interest payments were not made promptly; and

Whereas Congress alone can stop this wholesale foreclosure of farms, and without appropriate action these distressed farmers and their wives and little hungry children will be turned out into the cold and lose their homes: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That until December 31, 1932, all Federal land banks are directed (1) to withhold and suspend suits on and foreclosure of any mortgage securing a loan made by such bank on farm lands situated in the drought area of the United States, or in territory devastated by hail, floods, or tornado, where the borrower is financially unable to make the payments due; and (2) to extend the time for the payment of any such indebtedness to become due during 1931 and 1932 until December 31, 1932.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to advance to any such bank, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or that Congress may appropriate, a sum sufficient to cover the amount of the interest payable by such bank during the period mentioned in section 1 hereof, on any Federal farm-loan bond issued by it to the extent of maturities thus extended. The sums so advanced shall be used exclusively for the purpose of making such interest payments, and the Federal land bank receiving any such advance shall repay the same to the United States without interest in such manner and under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Farm Loan Board, acting jointly, shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. Any Federal land bank which has acquired, during a period of 18 months preceding the date of approval of this act, the land of any borrower from such bank upon foreclosure of a mortgage securing a loan made by the bank to such borrower is directed, if the bank still holds title to such land, to permit such borrower to redeem his interest in the land so acquired by the bank. Such redemption shall be permitted upon the payment by December 31, 1932, of all installments due under the terms of such mortgage to the time of such redemption. In the event of any such redemption the mortgage shall be revived and continued as security for all subsequent installments payable under the terms of the mortgage.

SEC. 2. Section 23 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 7, secs. 901, 902), is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph, as follows:

"Effective beginning with the first full semiannual period ending June 30 or December 31, following the enactment of this paragraph, every Federal land bank shall carry to reserve account semiannually a sum not less than 50 per cent of its net earnings until said reserve account shall show a credit balance equal to the outstanding capital stock of said land bank. After said reserve shows a credit balance equal to the outstanding capital stock, 10 per cent of the net earnings shall be added thereto semiannually. Whenever said reserve shall have been impaired it shall be fully restored before any dividends are paid. No Federal land bank shall declare or pay a dividend or dividends to shareholders unless approved by the Federal Farm Loan Board. Stock owned by the Government of the United States in Federal land banks shall receive no dividends. In the case of Federal land banks, the requirements of this paragraph shall be in lieu of the requirements of the first three sentences of this section and of the requirements as to percentages of reserves stated in the second paragraph of this section. This paragraph shall not be applicable to joint-stock land banks."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I do not desire to be critical in any way or to spoil this party of mutual admiration, but permit me to say, in all kindness, if the committee really wanted to render real service to the farmer it could have brought out a bill that would have been of some direct benefit to the farmers.

Just look at this bill, gentlemen. The Government will furnish money without interest to do what? To give to the bank for their stock, so that the banks can take up outstanding bonds. Well, in the name of the farmer, if the Government is going to furnish money without interest to benefit bondholders, why not lend it direct to the farmer? [Applause.] It does not seem to me to be a very involved question or very difficult to see that. Now, what is the situation? Section 4 of the bill provides for extension of time for interest and installment payments, and as soon as section 4 goes into effect the Government money goes out to the banks so that they may retire bonds, and then the farm-loan banks will be in a position where they will not be able to find money for new bonds. The present bondholders will cash in under the generous provisions of this bill for their benefit and the farmer will be little better off than he is now. So, really, as I see it, the only ones who will benefit directly by this measure will be the holders of the present outstanding bonds, and I do not believe that many farmers own these bonds. I venture that many speculators are just watching this legislation to buy up the bonds at their present low rate and dump them back on the banks now bolstered with $100,000,000 to take care of bonds.

With respect to section 4, where you provide for an extension of time and give the directors authority to extend the time, I believe they have that right now by mutual consent. Surely the borrower wants the time, and if the lender is willing to give him the time, I do not believe the mild provision in the law as expressed helps the farmer very much.

I would make section 4 more elastic, with more clear and direct aid to the farmer. I would give the borrower greater rights in the matter. I understand several amendments have already been prepared and will be offered by gentlemen having the interest of the farmer in mind.

At first blush, as the title of the bill and the $100,000,000 authorization is read, one might easily get the impression that something real, big, generous, and beneficial is being legislated for the farmer in distress, but I seriously doubt that the farmer will get much out of all of this talk and this particular bill.

Mr. SANDLIN. If the gentleman will permit, I am afraid the gentleman is exactly right.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I know I am right. There is no doubt about it.

If the poor farmer ever had a thousand-dollar bond of any farm loan bank, I venture to say that the bond has long since been sold or put up as collateral for a loan.

Gentlemen, you are not granting much relief to the farmer if you force more loans on him. The only way to grant him permanent relief is to give him money to replace existing loans at a lower rate of interest than he is now paying. Give the farmer a chance to get out of debt. If the Government can give $100,000,000 without interest to take care of the banks and their bonds, let us instead appropriate $100,000,000 to lend direct to the farmers. And this comes from a city man. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I do not want to throw a discordant note into this discussion, but I believe it is about time that we take stock and ascertain where we are headed.

In this country practically all the sources of credit have been frozen up except the Federal Government, and we are in process of freezing up the Federal Government. It is pretty difficult for an American to appreciate the fact that if we continue as we are going, one of these days we are going to wake up and find the bonds of the Federal Government considerably depreciated.

The other day we relieved some of our creditors who put money, ordinarily, into the Federal Treasury from the necessity of doing it. I refer to the moratorium. In this connection I do not criticize the act. To-day we propose to take some more money out of the Federal Treasury, and it seems a public necessity. Thus we go on with revenue reducing and appropriations increasing. It is time we began to have in mind what is going to happen if we continue to do this.

Farms have depreciated in this country probably 50 per cent. These bonds have depreciated 25 per cent, and all other bonds have depreciated. The plan seems to be to have the Federal Government take over all frozen assets. We are pouring water in the top of the pipe frozen up at the bottom.

As I stated a moment ago, I do not want to throw a monkey wrench into this machinery or to try to do it. I could not do it, anyway. In some shape we all know this bill is going to pass this afternoon. What I want to express is this one thought, gentlemen: Republicans and Democrats alike, we have got to put it out on the table and examine it. We have entirely exaggerated the efficacy of credit in America. You do not pay a debt by borrowing more money. We have these enormous public and private debts in this country. The big proposition is how we can pay them with the present commodity values. It can not be done. These commodity values have got to go up. The debts have got to be decreased proportionately or we are headed for a smash. There is not a bit of use of anybody who has got any sense failing to recognize that one of these three things confronts us, and we are not going to solve this problem by borrowing some more money or lending somebody some more money. Debts can not be paid by increasing debts. [Applause.]

We have got to tackle the proposition of getting these commodity values up. If we can not do that, then we have got to try to scale these debts down, and if we can not do that we might just as well get in condition for the inevitable.

This is not a panic, it is not a depression; it is a paralysis of the economic circulatory system of this country. It began with the paralysis of the buying power of the producers of exportable agricultural surpluses. They cultivate eighty-odd per cent of our agricultural acreage. This is a historical fact.

It is not possible for so important a part of our industries to be unable to buy, especially a basic industry, and avoid that paralysis extending on and on into other parts of the economic body. At this time I am not going to discuss the failure of the last Congress intelligently to deal with this situation. The necessity for this legislation grows out of that failure. We must treat this disease at the place where the disease begins, and not hypo the situation by borrowing more money, loaning more money to people already in debt.

I am not saying anything in reference to this bill. The bill is going to pass and everybody knows it. What I want to impress upon you, my fellow legislators in the House of Representatives, is that we have got a real job before us. One may bridge over a crisis, but let us not deceive ourselves. We can not solve our problems by loaning somebody some more money. The more money you loan the more interest you will have to pay, and the worse broke you will be when the crash comes. There is no use for anybody getting nervous. This is a real job of the first magnitude.

We have got to put our heads together, Democrats and Republicans alike. Credit in its proper place is all right, but let us not deceive ourselves. It is not a panacea. The ability of the Federal Government to make larger and larger loans and larger and larger appropriations out of constantly decreasing revenue is a thing which has its limits. The Federal Treasury is the last reserve. It is the last line of defense.

Democrats and Republicans, we have got to go deeper and think more constructively than how to get money from the Federal Treasury. It has its limits. Credit and more and more credit is the soothing potion which may lull us at a time when we ought to be wide awake to the real challenge involved in our circumstances, and meeting that challenge as only clear-thinking, comprehending, resolute people can do, making whatever sacrifice and paying whatever price is necessary. [Applause.]

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, I would agree with a good deal the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] has said if we could agree that conditions to-day were normal. If they were, liquidation down to what I consider subnormal would be necessary. But I am not willing to agree that present conditions must go on or that we are to remain down to present levels. I think this bill comes at an opportune time to help out the temporary agricultural depression.

I wish the language of section 4 was more direct and specific so as to declare more directly the policy of Congress in the passing of this legislation and that the generous purpose of giving $100,000,000 was primarily prompted by a desire to aid the farmers.

I can not agree with the gentlemen from Maine and Massachusetts who spoke of fear of section 4. I myself would like to have it go further. I hope the Federal Farm Board and the directors of the farm banks will read this debate that has taken place here on this bill and will see that only 2 Members have spoken against section 4, while about 15 have referred to it favorably. That, I think, represents the fair sentiment of the Members of the House.

The solvency of the farmers is the necessary and only basis for maintaining the value of the bonds of these farm banks. Wholesale foreclosures with the resultant bankruptcy of the mortgagors and the land being turned over to the banks or other persons who can not handle it in any better way than the original owner will not benefit the bonds or help the bondholders. It is my hope that this generous act on the part of Congress will be recognized by the Federal Farm Loan Board and the directors of the bank as being intended primarily for the benefit of the farmers and that section 4 expresses the wish of Congress as a guiding yardstick for the directors to follow in their dealings with the farmers during the present depression.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to thank the Committee on Banking and Currency for bringing this bill up for consideration at this time. I wish the bill went further along the line of legislation to stop the orgy of loan foreclosures that is now taking place under this system. I realize that the bill as brought here gives the system and the officials of the system the power to stop the foreclosures that are now taking place, but I understand from the committee and from members of the Federal Farm Loan Board that they are not in sympathy with the provision to decrease the number of foreclosures as contained in the bill, all of which must mean only one thing. If they are not in sympathy with the provision, they will not carry the provision into effect when it is left to their discretion. Yesterday, when I found that this bill was coming up for consideration to-day, I went to the Federal Farm Loan Board in Washington, and after a conference with the Farm Loan commissioner, Mr. Bestor, I came away from there convinced that the Federal Farm Loan Board in Washington is not at all in sympathy with section 4. I held a long conference with him. I did my best to get him to say something which I could construe into a promise on his part, so far as possible, to stop the foreclosures which are now taking place, but I failed. I came back to my office and sent a telegram to the Federal farm-loan banks at Columbia, S. C., New Orleans, La., and at Houston, Tex., and asked them the specific question as to what would be the policy of those banks in reference to the loan foreclosures now taking place. I received a reply from Columbia and a reply from the bank at Houston, Tex. Both of those replies absolutely ignored my question as to what would be the future policy and only claimed that in the past they have exercised discretion in these loan foreclosures, saying that in the future they would exercise the same discretion.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Does the gentleman not think this law should direct them what to do and not leave it to their discretion?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. I think so absolutely. The failure to do so means that section 4 will be of no value to the farmers of the country. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the telegrams that I sent to the Federal land banks and the replies that I received.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. This bill will give the Federal land banks an opportunity to render great service to the farmers of the country. I believe under the law, and under this bill if passed, they can take $25,000,000 or whatever is necessary to loan to those farmers who are delinquent, and let the farmers pay the identical money back to them on the interest due by the farmers. Thus they will recapture the money and then can apply it on the bonds. If they can do this they would be rendering a great service. Then, again, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency that these farm-loan banks can, if they will, resell to the original owner the land where foreclosures have taken place, then take a new loan, thus renewing the old loan, and give the man a chance to get back the land which has already been taken by loan foreclosure.

I certainly hope that this bill will be amended, either this afternoon or when it reaches the Senate, so as to require this Federal loan system to stop the foreclosure stampede that is now taking place.

I feel that the farmers of the country would have been infinitely better off if this farm-loan system had never been brought into existence. By it Congress invited the farmers to place these loans on their farms, with the belief that special consideration would be shown them in time of a financial depression. Now the farmers are finding that it would have been better for them if they had gone along as best they could without securing these loans.

I am frank to say that I have had better success getting extensions on long-term loans held by old-line life-insurance companies or other long-term loan concerns.

If by any chance this bill should finally become law without some provision stopping this orgy of foreclosure, I trust that the officials intrusted with the administration of this act will sense the will of this House and be much more liberal in the future than they have been in the past.

If they do not carry into effect the will of Congress as expressed here by debate at the time of the consideration of this measure, regardless of whether that will is expressed in definite provision in the bill or only by a kindly provision giving them the power to do so, I for one—and I am not by myself in this matter—believe that the Federal farm loan act should be repealed and proper steps taken to safeguard the rights of the farmers, bondholders, and other interested parties.

This bill as now worded is not in behalf of the farmers. It is clearly for the interest of the bondholders. I have no objections to legislation for the bondholders. It is the duty of Congress to protect those people that have helped the farmers of the country by the purchase of these bonds. I shall vote for the bill. I do hope, though, that it will be finally amended so as to become not only a bankers' and bondholders' bill but a farmers' bill as well.

Under the unanimous-consent agreement of the committee, I here insert the telegram sent by me to the president of the Federal Land Bank of Columbia, S. C., as follows:

DECEMBER 18, 1931.

FRANK H. DANIEL,
President Columbia Federal Land Bank, Columbia, S. C.:

House bill 6172 is pending in Congress to amend Federal farm loan act, as amended, so as to provide for $100,000,000 additional capital for Federal land banks. In order to keep record clear, I desire you wire me collect at once for insertion in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD answers to following questions:

Give number and total amount foreclosures of Columbia Federal Land Bank during last 12 months, also number and amount foreclosures now pending. If bill passes, will all or any foreclosures now pending be stopped? Tell in detail what effect passage of present bill will have on pending foreclosures and future policy of bank as to foreclosures. What officials determine whether or not foreclosure takes place and what has been done with lands heretofore taken over by foreclosure.

W. C. LANKFORD.

Mr. Chairman, I sent an identical telegram to the president of the Federal land banks at New Orleans, La., and Houston, Tex., and also to the general counsel of each of the three banks.

I have received no reply from the New Orleans bank, but am sure I will later in the day. If the reply from this bank expresses a more liberal attitude on the foreclosure question than that expressed in the telegrams from Columbia and Houston, I shall gladly have it inserted in the RECORD the first of next week.

The reply received from the Federal land bank at Columbia is as follows:

COLUMBIA, S. C., December 18, 1931.

Hon. W. C. LANKFORD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Reference your day letter advising House bill 6172 pending in Congress for consideration to-morrow to amend Federal farm loan act as amended so as to provide for one hundred million additional capital for Federal land banks. There were in force on January 1, 1931, 29,252 loans. For the 11-month period ended November 30, 1931, 1,033 foreclosure cases were completed, including foreclosure cases commenced in prior years. There are 834 loans now in process of foreclosure. Would require much time to furnish amount involved in connection with completed foreclosures and loans in process of foreclosure referred to above. Four executive officers of bank determine action regarding disposition delinquent loans, authorizing foreclosure only after full consideration of all facts in hand, including reports rendered by responsible field representatives and secretary-treasurers of associations, when concurred in by junior executive officers of bank actively engaged in handling this phase of bank's work. Lands acquired by bank rented to responsible farmers to best possible advantage wherever not resold on terms which afford reasonable protection to bank to farmers believed to be dependable. In our opinion, passage present bill for mutual interest banks and borrowers.

F. H. DANIEL,
President.
HARRY D. REED,
General Counsel, Federal Land Bank of Columbia.

The reply received by me from the Federal Land Bank at Houston, Tex., is as follows:

HOUSTON, TEX., December 18, 1931.

W. C. LANKFORD,
Member of Congress, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Re telegram would suggest that you can secure from the Farm Loan Bureau, Washington, the record of the Federal Land Bank of Houston in the matter of foreclosures and any other data desired. As to policy of the bank in the matter of foreclosures I could not speak, this being determined by the board of directors. The executive committee, after consideration of each case on its merits, determines questions of foreclosure. I feel it would be to the interest of the banks to pass the bill.

LEWIS ROGERS,
General Counsel, Federal Land Bank of Houston.

Mr. Chairman, many of the big daily papers are carrying big headlines in which this bill as now written is hailed as a moratorium for the farmers of the Nation. This is very erroneous. It is not a moratorium, but I hope it may become such, in practical effect, before it goes to the President for his approval.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I take advantage of this opportunity to express especially and directly my appreciation of the action taken by the distinguished chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee and to each of the members thereof in giving consideration to this, one of the primary numbers on the constructive program of the President, but I do not believe the committee has given that degree of consideration necessary for intelligent legislation upon this great question. Neither have you afforded to the members of this committee the opportunity or the information to act intelligently in passing upon a measure of this importance. That is not said in criticism, so far as it might be construed as purposely done, but because you are making haste at a time when you should proceed slowly, in order to give that degree of consideration to a broad national piece of legislation directly affecting the basic industry of our country. I have often thought since I have been in Washington that the people living in the atmosphere of the Capital, where a vast army of employees is steadily employed at fair wages, where millions and millions of dollars have been spent in construction, being so far removed from the unparalleled depression in the places from whence we come, that there seldom is a proper and adequate consideration or appreciation of the degree of depression in which agriculture and industry now find themselves. I do not believe there is. Why, you are in the lap of luxurious prosperity here as compared with every other section of the country. As suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], the bill does not afford a solution of the depression.

No one contends that it does. It is only one of the five numbers of the constructive programs of the President that deals with one of the major sources of depression.

As stated by the gentleman from Texas, it is a credit paralysis that is affecting this country. Since 1929 there has been a diminution or decrease of credit in this country exceeding six and one-half billion dollars. The purpose of this proposal is to relieve the deplorable situation of the farmers of this country in order that the family may continue to live on the farm. That is an essential consideration in the restoration of prosperity. You must protect, you must keep that family on the farm before you can recover from the existing depression.

Now, let us look at this bill. The primary purpose of the bill is to strengthen the Federal land banks, to restore credit, to bring the bonds to par, to create a dependable market for them, to restore confidence in the investment. That is the primary purpose of this bill, and so far as it goes, it is commendable.

To restore confidence in the investment is necessary to create a market for the bonds without the sale of which money can not be obtained to make the loans and without the ability to make the loans the system itself would be defeated of the very purposes for which it was created.

The second purpose of the bill is to administer the loans to the farmers in distress, to those who have been unable to pay their installments and are confronted with foreclosure proceedings, and this purpose can only be effected through administration.

Section 4 of the bill provides:

Each Federal land bank is authorized, when in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, to extend, in whole or in part, any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid, and to accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments during a period of five years or less thereafter, to be paid in equal amounts in addition to the regular installments to become due during such period.

It will be observed that this section leaves discretionary with the bank to extend in whole or in part any loan and it is in the exercise of this discretionary power that bad administration ensues and failure to carry out the purpose and spirit and intention of Congress.

Instead of being simply authorized the land banks should be directed to extend in whole or in part any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid when it is shown that the security is sufficient and the extension meritorious. This is the primary purpose of the legislation. For this we authorize an appropriation of $100,000,000. We want to see and make sure that the money is advanced to protect the mortgagor, the family on the farm. In addition to that the farmer should be given an additional year in which to pay past-due installments. The present depression has exhausted his resources. With wheat at 25 cents per bushel, oats 15 cents per bushel, and the price of other farm products in proportion, he has been unable to pay his taxes and living expenses.

This little moratorium to the farmer of one year with good security is nothing compared to the moratorium extending the payment of the interest due from foreign countries on their indebtedness without any security. On yesterday, by a vote of 317 to 100, such a moratorium was extended. Those who were so willing to grant such an extension to foreign countries should now be willing to grant an extension of one year to our own farmers. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment which I offered. It was in the nature of a pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The first three paragraphs of section 24 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 7, secs. 911–913), are amended, effective beginning with the first full semiannual period, ending June 30 or December 31, following the enactment of this act, to read as follows:

"That every national farm loan association shall, out of its net earnings, carry to reserve account semiannually a sum not less than 20 per cent of such net earnings until said reserve account shall show a credit balance equal to the outstanding capital stock of said association. After said reserve shows a credit balance equal to the outstanding capital stock 5 per cent of the net earnings shall be added thereto semiannually.

"Whenever said reserve shall have been impaired it shall be fully restored before any dividends are paid.

"After deducting 20 per cent or the 5 per cent hereinbefore directed to be credited to reserve account, said association may at its discretion declare a dividend to shareholders of the whole or any part of the balance of said net earnings."

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I only want to take a minute or two to call to the attention of the committee two things that I think have been slightly overlooked in the run of the debate. The first is the statement that there is at the present time approximately $28,000,000 in mortgage default. I think that is the figure given by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. That was the amount of land owned. The delinquents are not anything like that. I can give the gentleman the amounts exactly in a moment.

Mr. KETCHAM. I would like to have the exact figures.

Mr. STEVENSON. Delinquent less than 30 days, $2,125,000; delinquent 30 days to 60 days, $1,132,000; delinquent 60 days to 90 days, $1,755,000; delinquent over 90 days, $7,028,000; making a total of $12,042,584. That is all the delinquents. The 28,000,000 is the amount of land which the system now owns.

Mr. KETCHAM. That is the very point to which I wish to direct the attention of the committee. It seems to me that in the discussion the impression has been left that there is nothing to show at all for the $28,000,000 worth of land now in the hands of the Federal farm loan banks, and I think it deserves just a moment's time to emphasize the fact that that land, whatever its value may be ultimately when it shall be sold, is still to the credit of the farm loan banks.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman will permit, that, however, is not available as security for the bonds.

Mr. KETCHAM. That is correct. It is my understanding that when the foreclosures have been made those particular parcels of land upon which foreclosures have been made are absolutely taken out of the account of the bank and placed in another envelope, so to speak, and if anything is realized from it, well and good; but it should not be forgotten that that still remains as an asset.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield briefly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That $28,000,000 worth of land which is an asset to the bank is of very little comfort to the previous owners of that land.

Mr. KETCHAM. That is true.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We are trying to help the farmers.

Mr. KETCHAM. But I thought the impression might have been prevalent that there was nothing to show at all for the $28,000,000 of mortgaged lands defaulted.

In the second place, I want to take a moment to call attention to the advantage of this legislation to another group which has not been mentioned. All the discussion has gone to the point of relief for the men who have already borrowed and who are looking for an extension of their loans. As far as my correspondence goes, about half of it or more comes from those who are interested in negotiating new farm-loan bank loans, and the reason that new loans are not capable of being negotiated is that no bonds can be sold. Therefore I am strongly for this legislation, for I believe it will afford the farm-land banks just exactly the opportunity which they need and which they have desired to secure the necessary funds whereby loans may be made to the people who are in very dire distress by reason of the pressure that is being brought to bear upon them from other sources. So for that reason I am for it.

May I just call the attention of the committee to the suggestion that has been offered this afternoon, that I think has in it some very far-reaching consequences, and I hope the committee at some future time will give some careful consideration to it?

That is the suggestion which comes from the gentleman from North Dakota, namely, that a very fine service could be rendered to these men who, for instance, may have negotiated a loan for $10,000 and who have paid 50 per cent of it and who are now faced by reason of the situation with a foreclosure. Why can not a provision be written into the law by way of an amendment providing that that may be refunded—providing that the $5,000 be refunded upon the same terms as originally, and thereby not only retain the land as an asset of the Federal farm-loan bank but, more than anything else, reduce the payment which the farmer has to meet upon the amount which he now has to make, which was upon the original loan of $10,000. Reduce it by practically 50 per cent and so give aid all along the line.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KETCHAM. In this one minute—and I appreciate the courtesy of the committee in listening to me—I want to add a word which I think ought to be added by way of appreciation to the committee for the very prompt manner in which this legislation has been reported. As one who has always had a great interest in agriculture I want to extend to the chairman and to those on the majority side of the aisle, as my good friend from New York suggested we should, my own appreciation as one from the minority side for the very fine and constructive leadership shown in reporting so promptly this very fine piece of legislation, and I am for it. [Applause.]

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do this solely for the purpose of asking some questions about sections 2 and 3 of the members of the committee handling the legislation.

I have followed the debate very closely, and little or nothing has been said about either of those sections. Some rather active members of farm organizations have told me to-day that the farm organizations are not in favor of sections 2 and 3. Of course, these sections are new provisions added to the present provisions of the law with reference to the building up of reserves, first, in the Federal land banks, with which the second section deals, and, secondly, with the reserves of local associations with which section 3 deals. Will some one tell me what reserves we now have in the present land banks?

Mr. STEVENSON. I can tell the gentleman, if he will yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. The only reason I rose was to get information for the RECORD.

Mr. STEVENSON. The reserves that are now carried by the land banks are legal reserves of $13,200,111.35.

Mr. BURTNESS. About what percentage is that of the capital stock?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is not all. There are other reserves—that is, reserves against certain other contingencies—of $97,921. The total reserves are $13,298,000.

Mr. BURTNESS. What percentage is that of the capital stock?

Mr. STEVENSON. The capital stock is $65,000,000, in round numbers, I believe.

Mr. BURTNESS. Then the reserve has already been built up to aproximately 20 per cent?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; as 13 is to 65.

Mr. BURTNESS. The present law has been complied with. The present purpose seems to be to build that reserve up to 100 per cent, but in order to do that you are going to insist that the present stockholders contribute each year twice as much as they have been contributing during the time they have done very good work and built up the reserve to 20 per cent.

Mr. STEVENSON. My recollection is that section 23, which we are amending, calls for 25 per cent.

Mr. BURTNESS. It calls for 25 per cent of the actual savings to be turned over to the reserve, to be in turn built up each year until the total of 20 per cent of the capital stock has been reached. The present bill calls for 50 per cent of savings to be contributed each year until 100 per cent of the capital is reached, and then even after the 100 per cent is reached to continue on, resulting, of course, in this, that even though these farmers have paid for their stock, have gone through this distressing period and paid off their loans, yet they are compelled to contribute to this large surplus, all of which will go to the benefit of future borrowers rather than themselves.

I am not so sure that these provisions are quite fair to the present borrowers. I wish hearings had gone into the matter carefully. I recognize, of course, that the provisions will tend to build up a stronger system. In any event I wanted to get the facts into the RECORD, and the matter can be given further consideration by the Senate committee. There are probably two sides to it.

Could the gentleman tell me anything with reference to section 3, as to what the status is with reference to the reserves, generally speaking, in the local farm-loan associations?

Mr. STEVENSON. I have not those figures.

Mr. BURTNESS. I assume that most of those are in rather bad shape and have not reached the maximum set out in the present law.

Mr. STEVENSON. There are a good many of those all over the United States, and the board could not furnish us with those figures. We do not have the figures as to the amount of the reserves in those associations, but many of them have reserves, although many of them have lost their reserves by reason of injudicious investments, so I do not think there is very much in most of them.

Mr. BURTNESS. The same argument as to building up of reserves in the land banks applies to reserves in the local associations. The interests of the stockholders—an opportunity to get a return on the stock held by the farmer borrowers—should be given fair consideration as well as the necessity to build up a strong, safe institution for the future.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 25 of the Federal farm loan act (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 7, sec. 921) is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph to read as follows:

"Each Federal land bank is authorized, when in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, to extend, in whole or in part, any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid, and to accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments during a period of five years or less thereafter, to be paid in equal amounts in addition to the regular installments to become due during such period."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: Page 5, line 8, after the word "period," strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following:

"Provided, That in the granting of extensions, preference shall be given to farmers who own, live on, and cultivate the land on which the Federal land bank holds a lien."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the principle that is embodied in this amendment is, of course, a good principle, but it involves the principle of saying thou shalt extend aid to one class in preference to another. The bill as it stands means that the board shall exercise its discretion in all cases, and it is not to be determined by the place where the man who applies for it resides. We assume that the board will carry out the purpose of the act, which prescribes that a man shall live on the property or shall show the reason why. If they make him a loan where he does not live on the land, we submit that he will have convinced them that he was justified in living somewhere else, and we do not think it is proper to introduce a mandatory provision here which will necessarily discriminate against one class of borrowers. We think all that had better be left to the discretion of the board of directors.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKEOWN: Page 5, after the word "bank," in line 1, insert the following: "Is directed for the period of one year to extend upon application in whole or in part any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid," so as to read:

"Each Federal land bank is directed for the period of one year to extend upon application in whole or in part any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid and thereafter, when in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, to extend in whole or in part any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid, and to accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments during a period of five years or less thereafter, to be paid in equal amounts in addition to the regular installments to become due during such period."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not want to come in here and vote for a bill and have it heralded to the country, which would be justified, that I voted for a bill to put $100,000,000 in the Federal land banks of this country and sent it out as a sop to the farmers who are having their homes taken from them every day by the Federal land banks of this country.

They say they will have a sympathetic attitude under this bill. I know a story that is told down in my State. We had a very fine banker down there, but, unfortunately, he had a glass eye. He was very proud of the fact that he had procured a glass eye that nobody could tell from his natural eye. A fellow went into the bank one day to borrow $100 from him, and he thought he would have a little fun out of the fellow, and he said: "I will tell you what I will do with you. If you will tell me which eye is an artificial eye, I will lend you the $100." The fellow looked at him and said, "I believe it is your right eye." This banker said, "You are right; but I do not see how you were able to tell it. I have had hundreds of people guess and they have not been able to guess right. How could you tell it?" He said, "I thought I saw a little gleam of sympathy out of your right eye." [Laughter.]

That is the kind of sympathetic administration you are going to get. Now, why does this Congress come here and turn over $100,000,000 to the bankers to take care of their mortgages and refuse to say we will stop foreclosures for one year?

Oh, they say it is unconstitutional. I know one eminent lawyer of this body that will never say that it is unconstitutional. I refer to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

They are giving this money to the officers to pay their salaries, and you tell me that you can not tell these men what to do with it. My friend from Virginia will tell you that it is not unconstitutional. It is mere camouflage.

Now, what does this amendment do? It says that one year you shall not foreclose a mortgage for unpaid debt, and after that you can exercise your discretion and carry on your sympathetic administration of the bill. You have plenty of time to do it. That is, when the conditions are ripe, they say, and I say right now the conditions are ripe to extend the farm loan mortgages.

We came in here yesterday and I voted to extend for one year a moratorium for the German people. Now, I want to give an extension to the farmers of this country.

Oh, they say it is not good banking. The truth about it is in this country the big business men have said all the time that Congress ought not to be in session; that it ought to adjourn; that it was hurting business. That has been their cry all the time. If the Congress could get the country in a worse mess than they have I do not see how it could be done. [Laughter and applause.]

Big business got the country into this shape, and now when they want $100,000,000 they say they want it to aid the farmers of the country. If you want to do something for the farmers, vote for my amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 4 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the time for the payment of any installment due and payable to any Federal land bank prior to one year after the enactment of this act, under the terms of any mortgage securing a loan made by such bank, may, at the request of the person from whom such installment is due, be extended by such bank for a period of not more than two years; except that this act shall not be construed to authorize extension of the time for payment of any installment under a mortgage in respect of which a foreclosure proceeding has been instituted.

"The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make advances, within the limits of appropriations hereafter made for such purpose, to Federal land banks of amounts equal to installments in respect of which extensions of time have been granted as herein authorized. The bank to which any such advance is made shall repay the same to the United States, without interest, within such time, in such manner, and under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Farm Loan Board, acting jointly, may prescribe. Amounts so repaid shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I shall not consume much time in discussing this amendment. There have been a number of my colleagues who are desirous of putting into effect a moratorium on these loans and giving specific directions to the Federal land banks. I favor the bill in its present form if it is the best bill that we can get. I shall vote for it, but it surely should be amended as suggested in my proposed amendment. This amendment gives specific direction to the land banks to extend time of payment of Federal land-bank mortgage notes if the debtor is unable to pay and requests extension. I have faith in the officers of the land banks, but somehow I fear that many of our constituents may be unable to obtain extensions on their loans unless my amendment is adopted.

On December 31, 1930, there were 511,050 loans to the value of $1,778,943,342.45 outstanding for Federal and joint-stock land banks. More than $6,000,000 of this is owned by farmers. Florida is one of the smaller farm States it is true, but our people are in need of extension of time on their loans.

A total of 650,976 farms, with loans totaling $2,587,075,678.30, have been foreclosed. This was the number up until September 30, 1931. The percentage of foreclosures is increasing. For the first nine months of 1930 foreclosures aggregating $4,471,988.45 were made, while the first nine months of 1931 had $4,918,304.77 worth of land mortgages foreclosed by the Federal land and joint-stock banks. Thus, you will see, my colleagues, that we must pass remedial legislation; therefore, we must pass the bill before us now, but let us amend it by making it definite that we are extending to these debtors at least one year's moratorium.

Now, on yesterday the House passed a bill granting a moratorium to America's foreign debtors. Now, will you not to-day be at least as generous to our own American farmers, who are making their last stand, with their backs to the wall, fighting for their sole economic existence? As for me, I am far more concerned about the welfare of the American people than I am about the welfare of Germany and other foreign debtors, and I hope you will join with me in voting for the amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I am sorry; I have not sufficient time.

The farm population represents nearly one-third of our Nation's population. They have seen their fortunes dwindle until the farm wealth of the Nation to-day is only about half of that of 10 years ago. By passage of this bill as amended—if my amendment is adopted—it is hoped that many of their farms will be saved for them. Our farmers are the most noble of all our citizenship; they work from dawn until twilight beneath the blue canopy of heaven, and there wring their honest living by the sweat of their brow from the plenteous breast of mother earth. I challenge you to show me a citizenship more noble or courageous. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Florida for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The substitute was rejected.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WRIGHT as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. MCKEOWN: Strike out the paragraph on page 5, lines 1 to 8, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Each Federal land bank is required upon the application of any borrower to extend, in whole or in part, any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid and to accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments during the period of five years, or less, thereafter, to be paid in equal amounts, in addition to the regular installments to become due during such period."

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I have very great respect for the eminent ability of the gentlemen composing the Committee on Banking and Currency. I wondered, however, why they inserted section 4 in this bill. It is absolutely meaningless. It confers no authority upon the Federal land banks which they do not already have. It simply provides that the Federal land banks are authorized to make these extensions, whenever in the judgment of the board of directors it is proper to do so. You are conferring no authority upon the Federal land banks or boards of directors other than that which they now enjoy. Why put that language in the bill? It is not binding upon anybody. The Federal land banks and boards of directors can ignore it absolutely, and yet in the debate here to-day it has been spoken of by some Members as a provision in favor of the farmer, which insures to the farmer a right to renew his loans. There is absolutely nothing in it. The amendment I have offered follows the language of the amendment inserted by the Banking and Currency Committee in section 4, but instead of making it discretionary, instead of being a useless thing, it requires that these Federal land banks shall accept payment for these unpaid installments by renewing them over a period of over five years.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. MOUSER. In the amendment suggested by the gentleman he says that the Federal land bank is required upon application to lend "in whole or in part."

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. MOUSER. I take it that that means that it is a mandatory direction.

Mr. WRIGHT. That means it is mandatory.

Mr. MOUSER. How about the words "in whole or in part"?

Mr. WRIGHT. It means that where a borrower makes application for an extension of the whole of an unpaid installment or a part of it he shall get the extension.

Mr. MOUSER. Whatever he applies for, either part of it or the whole of it, they must grant it.

Mr. WRIGHT. That gives them the absolute right to receive these benefits if they make application. Just a word now about the bill. I am going to support it. I think the Banking and Currency Committee brought out about the best bill that they could under the circumstances, but it is a bill essentially in the interest of the bondholders of these land banks.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And without the gentleman's amendment it would be worthless?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes; except that it does help the bondholders, and I think they are entitled to some sympathy, because most of them bought the bonds with the idea that they were Government bonds.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does not the gentleman believe that the bill ought to go back to the committee unless something is done really for the farmer?

Mr. WRIGHT. I do. They ought to get some relief. They talk about foreclosures. It is about the speediest and shortest foreclosure that you can imagine. They do not have to go into court, where a six months' period is required, as it usually is. There is a provision in these mortgages which gives them the power of sale, and all they do is to advertise the farmer's land for 30 days.

Mr. SIMMONS. That does not apply in my State; it may in the gentleman's.

Mr. WRIGHT. It does in mine.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is where the State law allows it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am speaking about Georgia; I do not know about the other State laws.

Mr. STEVENSON. You would have to amend your State laws.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am not complaining about the State laws.

The farmer does not know whether to pitch his crop or not. They can foreclose during the growing season. The usual result is that the land does not bring anything near the amount of the mortgage and interest, and the farm-loan bank buys it in and pays taxes on it, because no one is willing to rent it unless they are aided in making a crop.

Something was said about the relentless manner in which these banks proceeded. An instance of that kind came to my attention recently. The farmer had procured one of these feed, seed, and fertilizer loans, and, of course, had obligated himself to use that money only for this purpose. A field man from one of these banks came out and said if he did not pay a part of this money, they would foreclose on him.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ARENTZ) there were—ayes 171, noes 47.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the substitute amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the substitute amendment offered to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The Clerk again reported the substitute amendment.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma be now reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] will again be reported.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr. MCKEOWN.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the substitute amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The substitute amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. QUIN) there were—ayes 90, noes 133.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the amendment as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS: On page 5, line 4, after the word "unpaid," insert "for a period of one year beyond the date of the last regular installment payable under such mortgage"; and after the word "installment," in line 5, strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that debate is closed I ask that the Clerk read the section as it would read with the amendment I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the section as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the section as amended, as follows:

Each Federal land bank is authorized, when in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, to extend in whole or in part any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid for a period of one year beyond the date of the last regular installment payable under such mortgage and to accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS) there were—ayes 69, noes 118.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ARENTZ: On page 5, line 5, after the word "installments," strike out the balance of the section and insert "on or before or at the end of the amortization period with the rate of interest per annum on such unpaid installment as is specified in the mortgage."

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we may discuss the matter for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the section may be read in the way it would appear with the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ARENTZ) there were—ayes 45, noes 96.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARE: On page 5, at the end of line 8, add a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"That wherever a foreclosure has been made and the mortgaged lands are still in the possession of the bank the mortgagor shall have the right to redeem and repossess said lands upon payment of all costs incident to foreclosure and all delinquent installments."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HARE) there were—ayes 79, noes 114.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARBOUR: On page 5, line 1, after the word "bank," strike out the words "is authorized" and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall."

In line 2, after the word "it," strike out the word "to."

In line 4, after the word "and," strike out the word "to," so that section 4 shall read:

"Each Federal land bank shall, when in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, extend in whole or in part any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid and accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments during a period of five years or less thereafter, to be paid in equal amounts in addition to the regular installments to become due during such period."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARBOUR) there were—ayes 87, noes 111.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The question was taken, and tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAYBURN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6172) to amend the Federal farm loan act as amended and to provide for additional capital for Federal land banks, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. McKEOWN. I am.

The SPEAKER. Is there any member of the committee opposed to the bill who wishes to make a motion to recommit? [After a pause.] The gentleman from Oklahoma offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McKEOWN moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to that committee to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

On page 5, line 1, after the word "bank" insert the following: "is directed for the period of one year to extend in whole or in part any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 192, not voting 76, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 19, 1931.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I am conscious of a great debt of gratitude that I owe the House of Representatives and each of its Members. For the recent action of the House continuing me in its service I am deeply appreciative and thankful.

And on to-day, the fiftieth anniversary of my official connection with the House, further happy evidence was manifested in the remarks of the minority leader, Mr. SNELL, and of the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. LINTHICUM, of the generous and kindly attitude of the House toward me. For these very handsome tributes, and for the uniform courtesy accorded me by the Members of this and of preceding Congresses during the last 50 years, I feel a sense of thankfulness in my heart which can not find expression in words.

To serve the House of Representatives is a great privilege. But the opportunities for service here are not alone to the House itself but to the people as well, and I may be pardoned in saying that I have endeavored to embrace and make the best of the opportunities offered me.

It is my very earnest wish and prayer that every Member of the House may enter into the spirit and enjoy the blessings of peace and happiness of the Christmastide, and that the new year, which will mark the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Gen. George Washington, will bring to them and to our beloved country contentment, which in itself is great riches.

To you, Mr. Speaker, the tenth Speaker under whom I have served, I desire personally to express my thanks for the many kindnesses you have bestowed upon me during the 30 years of your own distinguished service in the House, and to felicitate you upon being called to your present high office, the duties of which you will discharge impartially, and with fidelity to the best traditions of the House, and with great ability born of experience.

With assurances of both my esteem and my gratitude to you and to the Members of the House of Representatives, whom I am proud to regard as my friends, I am

Very sincerely,

WM. TYLER PAGE.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—INVESTIGATION OF BATTLEFIELDS IN THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President, which was read, and with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 11, 1926, entitled "An act to provide for the study and investigation of battlefields in the United States for commemorative purposes," I am transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War giving a detailed report of progress made under said act, together with his recommendation for further operations.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 19, 1931.

EMPLOYMENT SERVICE, DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 142, with a Senate amendment.

The Cleark read the title of the joint resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 142

Making an additional appropriation for the Employment Service, Department of Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the language "Provided further, That after January 1, 1932, no salary shall be paid in any field employment office under the Employment Service at a rate in excess of $2,000 per annum. Provided further, That this limitation shall not apply to the salary of any State director."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate to the House joint resolution with the following amendment:

"In lieu of the matter stricken out insert the following:

"Provided further, That no salary shall be paid under this appropriation at a rate in excess of $2,000 per annum."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As I understood the proposition it would dislocate the administration of the entire service. A great many employees get over $2,100. What the Secretary fears is that this will establish a reduction in the standard of wages.

Mr. BYRNS. Quite the contrary, I will say. The provision adopted by the House might have been so construed. But the gentleman will recall that that applied not only to the appropriation of $120,000 but also to the appropriation for the current year under which 96 offices have been established. The Senate struck that provision out. This amendment simply provides that no salary paid under this particular appropriation shall exceed $2,000, which is entirely acceptable and in accordance with the statement made by the Secretary of Labor before both the House and the Senate committee.

Mr. SNELL. This is more generous than that provision which passed the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the Secretary wants a $2,100 man, this amendment proposes that he shall not pay in excess of $2,000.

Mr. BYRNS. The Secretary of Labor does not propose to pay in excess of $2,000 in any of the offices established under this appropriation. This simply puts into language the statement of the Secretary of Labor that not more than $2,000 will be paid for any position under this particular appropriation of $120,000. This does not relate to the appropriation of $833,000 in the current law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman states the Secretary of Labor stated that he did not intend to pay any new officer under this appropriation over $2,000.

Mr. BYRNS. The Secretary of Labor was asked what he proposed to do with the money if he received it, and he said that there were to be three in the office—a manager, an assistant manager, and a stenographer-clerk.

That they were to be paid $2,000, $1,800, and $1,440, respectively. The Committee on Appropriations recommended that the appropriation be reduced to $120,000, giving only 2 employees in about 27 offices, and giving him discretion to use 3 employees in the other offices. It left the question of salaries to him, having received his assurance in the hearings as to the maximum which would be paid. But the House, when the resolution was under consideration on the floor, adopted the amendment, with which the gentleman is familiar, restricting the Secretary of Labor in all the offices, those now in existence and those to be established.

Mr. CONNERY. Why did the committee cut down on certain offices and leave other offices with more help? Is there any particular reason for that? As I understand it, the committee cut down the estimate, which was $168,000.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. The committee cut it down to $120,000.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes. Out of these 96 offices there are 60 offices now which have only two employees.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman is satisfied that the Secretary of Labor is satisfied with this proposition?

Mr. BYRNS. It is exactly in line with his statement. I do not know whether he wants it written into the law or not.

Mr. SNELL. If it is in line with his statement, he ought to be satisfied.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. In a good many of these offices there is only one employee in charge?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Yesterday I happened to be in the Labor Office, as I frequently am, when this question came up, and the Assistant Secretary said to me that if this passed as it was with the amendment, it would affect services over in another part, already established, that ought not to be affected, and they were much wrought up over it. Unless there is some excellent reason for this amendment, it seems to me that the amendment ought to be left out, and the resolution as passed by the Senate ought to be concurred in.

Mr. BYRNS. The House by a very large vote adopted the amendment which would have done just what the gentleman has said. The amendment which I propose does not affect those offices now established, which amount to 96. This amendment applies only to those offices which will be established under this new appropriation of $120,000 and which are to continue only until July 1.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And the Secretary stated to the committee, as the gentleman stated to the House, that $2,000 and $1,800 and $1,440 would be the maximum pay.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; for the personnel under these new offices.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to get the appointment of all of those jobs at those figures.

Mr. CONNERY. I do not want this to be the camel's nose under the tent, to reduce the Federal salaries.

Mr. BYRNS. This has no application to employees now on the roll. It applies simply to the new employees who will be put in under this appropriation of $120,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I call up H. R. 6285, relating to the contributions of the United States toward defraying expenses of the District of Columbia, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, approved June 29, 1922, as reads as follows: "That, annually, from and after July 1, 1922, 60 per cent of such expenses of the District of Columbia as Congress may appropriate for shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia derived from taxation and privileges, and the remaining 40 per cent by the United States, excepting such items of expense as Congress may direct shall be paid on another basis; and" (D. C. Code, title 20, sec. 670a), is repealed; and hereafter such expenses of the District of Columbia as Congress may appropriate for shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, except that the United States shall make such contributions toward defraying such expenses as may be provided in the acts making appropriations therefor.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the so-called 60–40 law has been inoperative for several years; it is practically a dead letter. The Committee on Appropriations has been appropriating a lump contribution for the Federal Government for the expenses of the District government for some years. However, the 60–40 proportion is still the substantive law, and while the lump-sum provision has been held in order, it is thought it might be argued at any time that it is subject to the point of order. Therefore, we are asking to have the law repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed; and a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members speaking on the land bank bill to-day be permitted to extend their own remarks in the RECORD for the next five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, again we find the House passing legislation advocated by the President of the United States which has been heralded to the country as a relief measure for farmers indebted to the Federal land banks. But in reality this bill proposes direct relief to the holders of Federal land-bank bonds. I voted when the bill was up for consideration for every amendment offered by various Members proposing to amend section 4 of the bill so that farmers who are unable to pay their installments, due to no fault of theirs, would have further time; but every amendment was promptly voted down. I also voted, as the RECORD will show, for the amendment of my good friend and colleague, Mr. MCKEOWN, which reads as follows:

On page 5, line 1, after the word "bank," insert the following: "It is directed for the period of one year to extend in whole or in part any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid."

This amendment would have compelled the Federal land banks to extend payments to farmers, but it was also voted down, to the tune of 192 to 165. Under section 4 we have the following language:

Each Federal land bank is authorized, when in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, to extend, in whole or in part, any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid, and to accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments during a period of five years or less thereafter, to be paid in equal amounts in addition to the regular installments to become due during such period.

This, as you see, simply leaves it optional with the land banks and gives them no more power than they have now, under the original act. Knowing the policy of the Federal land banks under the rules and regulations of the Federal land bank board in the past, I venture the assertion that not 1 farmer out of 10 will receive any consideration under this section.

I am sure that every Member who voted for this legislation understands that there is not a line or a word in the bill that would force any land bank to extend farmers' payments. Let me quote from a speech of one of my colleagues:

I favor this legislation and want the men who enforce it to understand that it is the intent of Congress to see that relief is granted to the downtrodden farmers.

May I state that it was the intention of Congress that the marketing act and the Federal Farm Board, whose duty it was to enforce this act, give to the downtrodden farmers relief, but it has been so enforced under rules and regulations promulgated by the Federal Farm Board that, instead of giving farmers relief, farmers have been relieved of what little they had.

I am one Member of Congress who believes, from 10 years' experience it is getting time that the Congress write into legislation some of the rules and regulations governing same. In other words, put in the words, "Thou shalt," especially so when we find out of past experience in practically every instance when the President appoints the members of these Federal boards he appoints men who are a part of and interested in highly organized groups, that are able to dictate the interpreting of the law and the policy governing same. Listen to this statement I am quoting from the speech of my good friend and colleague [Mr. STEAGALL], chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee (the committee reporting this bill):

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.
Mr. BRIGGS. I would like to ask the gentleman, in reference to section 4, if it is the intention of the committee [Banking and Currency] that this section providing for extension shall be liberally construed by the Federal Land Bank Board in the exercise of its discretion.

In other words, Mr. BRIGGS wants to know if it will be mandatory on the part of the board to grant extensions to farmers. Listen to the answer.

Mr. STEAGALL. I can not say what will be done by the Federal Land Bank Board under its rules and regulations.

I want to quote further from Mr. STEAGALL'S speech, which I am sure will be sufficient to prove my contention as to whom this bill will relieve.

Mr. STEAGALL. In respect to the bonds [land-bank bonds] let me say now that there are many bonds carried by the banks and the investment public in this country which can not be realized upon simply because of the unusual conditions and because of the economic situation in which we are involved at this time.

May I state that my farmers during this year with but little assistance and in thousands of cases without any assistance from banks, but with a bountiful supply of sunshine and rain given to them by the One who deals fairly with all classes, produced good crops of cotton and corn, but they have had to sacrifice this good crop of cotton for 5 and 6 cents per pound and their corn for 30 cents per bushel.

In the meantime all that they have received at the hands of their Government and the Federal Farm Board is sympathy and the advice that they should plow up every third row of cotton. Certainly the President, international bankers, holders of these bonds, and Members of Congress should know that the staying of foreign debts, the relieving of international bankers and bondholders will not bring back normal prosperity.

I contend that we are simply soothing the pains of one limb of the body, so to speak, rather than perform the major operation whereby we may be able to bring real relief and a real cure for the serious economic situation that exists to-day. To my mind, the only way we will be able to restore normal prosperity will be to put the millions of unemployed to work at a fair wage and pass legislation establishing a new and up-to-date marketing and distributing system whereby thousands of middlemen that are sapping the very lifeblood out of farmers and consumers would be eliminated, and give the farmers a fair price for that which they produce. This will enable them to pay their honest obligations as well as restore the purchasing power of these people.

When we go back home for the Christmas holidays and our farmer constituents ask eagerly and hopefully, "Have you done anything to give us a fair price for our cotton and did you pass a bill requiring the Federal land banks to give us a little more time so that we may save the dear old home place?" let us tell them the real truth.

We will have to tell them that we passed legislation giving foreign countries 12 months and then 10 years to pay their present obligations due our Government, as well as a bill authorizing $100,000,000 appropriation for the relief of holders of Federal land-bank bonds now in the hands of banks and the investing public.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, this entire bill, with the exception of section 4, was drawn by friends of the administration to carry out the recommendation of the President, and seeks to amend the Federal farm loan act only for the purpose of advancing $100,000,000 for the purpose of buying shares of stock in the Federal land banks. It is contended that by the Secretary of the Treasury advancing this money it will increase the value of the bonds now outstanding and place the banks in a more substantial financial condition.

As a matter of fact, all the bonds outstanding are amply secured and will be paid at maturity, and no defaults have been made in the payment of any interest. It is true that these bonds are selling below par, but that is true of almost all bonds, including some of the United States Treasury certificates. The stock in these Federal land banks is owned principally by persons who have mortgaged their lands and have been required to use 5 per cent of their loan in buying stock. This money is being loaned by the Government to these banks without interest and is to be repaid only as loans are made to farmers and stock is sold, the money thus realized from the sale of stock to pay back the Government loan. This is no relief to the farmers, as those who are in dire need are those who already have land-bank mortgages upon their lands and are unable to meet their payments. The contention that this bill will help the farmers is simply a camouflage. If we want to help the farmers as we should, why not give them some direct legislation instead of giving the greater benefit of this loan to these land banks? No one is being hurt because these bonds are below par. The bonds are owned, to a great extent, by those who sought investment for the interest they collect and are assured of their interest and principal at maturity by the 12 banks in the Federal land-bank system. The bonds pass as par as assets for depositories and in banks all over the country. This legislation is simply in the interest of big business and for the express purpose of using the Government's money to increase in value the outstanding bonds.

There is nothing in the measure that could help the depression.

Since the bill was originally drawn and introduced the committee to which it was referred has added, as an amendment, section 4, which provides:

> Each Federal land bank is authorized, when in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, to extend, in whole or in part, any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid, and to accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments during a period of five years or less thereafter, to be paid in equal amounts in addition to the regular installments to become due during such period.

This amendment was inserted by the Democratic members of the committee, together with one Republican member, with all the other Republican members of the committee voting against it. This amendment, however, is already the law. The directors of these banks now have the authority to do exactly what this amendment provides, and in many instances the banks are pursuing this course where they can get additional security on crops, livestock, and so forth. It is claimed by the friends of the bill that the money so obtained from the Treasury will be loaned to the farmers. As a matter of fact, we all know, or at least believe, that is not the purpose of these land banks. Most of those who have been able to borrow from these land banks are suffering from the depression and unable to meet their payments. The farmers who are suffering from the depression and are able to live are not clamoring for an opportunity to borrow on their farms. The value of their farms has so depreciated no one wants such an investment, and the large banks refuse to carry as assets or security on loans mortgages on real estate. What we need to do is to grant relief to those who are entitled to and seeking relief, instead of giving an opportunity for others to borrow and get in the same condition.

We have given to the European countries an extension of time for the payment of their war debts to us in the form of a moratorium. Why not give this same relief to the farmers of this country, especially those who are unable to meet their payment to the Federal land banks?

While we are passing a law under the claim of helping the farmers, why not give them direct aid and pass a law that has some teeth in it, instead of passing a law leaving it to the directors of these land banks to do what they are now permitted to do. Section 4 of the bill should be so amended as to direct the Federal land banks, for a period of one year, to extend in whole or in part any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid. There are now only approximately $12,000,000 of installment payments delinquent, and many of these will be paid. Even if we were to use $25,000,000 of this money for granting extensions of time to the farmers who are unable to meet their installment payments, we would still have $75,000,000 left for the purpose of increasing the price of the outstanding bonds. We would then be granting relief where relief is really needed. Simply to pass a law to increase the value of bonds would mean that those who have purchased these bonds from 75 to 90 cents on the dollar would reap a handsome profit. The farmers, for whose benefit this law was originally passed, would reap none of the benefits and get no relief. It was never the intention of the administration and its friends to enact a law for the direct relief of the farmers; their only purpose is to benefit big business. When the farmers fail to prosper, those in the cities feel the effects of hard times.

Farm-land mortgages are being foreclosed every day and will continue to be unless we grant some relief. Under the terms of this bill, unless an amendment is adopted to section 4, no relief will be granted or extended to those deserving of and seeking relief. The president of these 12 Federal farm-loan banks is not only opposed to section 4 as contained in this bill but is opposed to any amendment, as we ascertain from the expression of his friends on the other side of the aisle, many of whom are momentarily conferring with him. His action is indicative of the fact that this money is not being obtained for the real aid and relief of the farmers but for the benefit of the banks and to increase the value of their bonds. It is claimed that he states that these bonds will be met at maturity, and we know this is true, because they have sufficient mortgages with which to pay them, in addition to the 28,000,000 acres of land that these banks own by reason of foreclosures.

Due to the influence of this administration, Europe was granted relief from the payment of this year's war debt and asked to make the payment in future installments over a period of 10 years. Why not a moratorium for these farmers for one year?

The committee claims the bill is the best it could agree upon. Such an agreement is a confession of lack of leadership. How can one explain to a farmer needing relief on his past-due mortgage why he should not be granted a breathing spell when such relief is given to big business and to Europe?

It will be interesting to note those who vote against amending this bill so as to afford some real relief. It will be more interesting to hear their explanations to the despondent and depressed farmers.

The worst assets for these banks are lands on which they must pay taxes and other expenses. Add to this the depreciation from nonhome occupancy, waste, and injury to improvements, all resulting from foreclosure. On the other hand relief for 1-year payments and the owners' occupancy means better morale for the community, better business for the trading centers, and tends to a building up rather than a tearing down. Give the depressed farmer a chance to make good and thus instill faith and ambition to assist in overcoming this great panic, rather than throw him and his loved ones in the public road, adding to the millions of unemployed. His home is dear to him and, if given a chance such as this administration gives to Europe and big business, he will make good.

Why do the Federal land banks' officials and their Republican spokesmen oppose this weak section 4, inserted by the committee? Simply because they do not intend to make extensions. Then why not amend this section to make it mandatory?

They are seeking the entire relief for their bondholders and intend to grant no relief to the delinquent farmers.

This bill is exactly as recommended by President Hoover and drawn by his "yes men." The reactionary Republicans are for it to a man. It does not seek to cure the sore but treats the symptoms rather than the disease. Experience should teach us to study well the administration's pet measures and to take no chances without safeguards. Are the measures workable and in the interest of big business, or for those needing relief? Unless relief is demanded in the law it will be administered like the Farm Board, where $250,000,000 of the Government's money has been squandered and lost in the name of farm relief, and where officials draw salaries as high as $75,000 annually. What a shame. It is no worse in principal than this measure.

If breakfasts at the White House for committees, telegrams, letters, and personal influence are going to result in such legislation, those who favor relief for the masses as against special powerful interests might as well go home and let the Republican minority in the House carry on the Hoover program. In the light of the past, it is reasonable to conclude it will not be for the unemployed, the farmer, laborer, veterans, small banker, or business man, but the international bankers, bondholders, and highly protected interests will not be overlooked.

I realize one who disagrees with a committee's recommendation and demands direct relief for the oppressed farmer is considered radical or to be practicing demagoguery, but the world knows it takes radical measures to extricate us from the present financial depravity.

I can not believe the Senate will permit the taxpayers' money to be used to boost the bond prices of favored banks without demanding direct relief to the delinquent farm borrower.

PAY OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which would permit the employees of the House to be paid upon the 21st day of December, before the Christmas holidays, instead of at the end of the year, which would follow the custom of a great many years.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I call the attention of my friend to the fact that we had an election recently resulting in a change in the control of this House.

These patronage employees here are rapidly leaving their places. That is the fortune of politics. They go along with the election. It might happen that somebody would be appointed in their place, and they would be out and get a vacation anyway, but the man who was appointed might serve several days without any pay.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Not at all, if the gentleman please.

Mr. RAINEY. Why not?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Suppose they are dropped a few days before the first of the month, and are given a few days' pay; that certainly is little enough consolation for going out in the cold world in these times of depression, and of course the new employee will be paid.

Mr. RAINEY. There will be a lot more going out in the cold world after the elections next fall, so they might as well get used to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. These same ones will be going out again.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The employees have all made their arrangements and planned on this, and it will be a hardship for some of them if they are not paid. Some of them will not be able to go home.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but I must object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I interrogate the gentleman from Illinois as to the order of business on next Monday? As I understand, there is nothing coming up on Monday or Tuesday except noncontroversial matters—some one desiring to address the House?

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman is right about that. There is nothing controversial to be taken up. We will undoubtedly go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message, and simply have speeches on Monday and Tuesday.

OIL MONOPOLY—TARIFF

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the oil tariff.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, the independent oil industry for nearly two years has been begging the Congress for protection from free imported oil. The independent oil industry has been telling the Congress and the country that four great oil companies, Standard Oil of Indiana, Standard Oil of New Jersey, Gulf, and Shell, were deliberately wrecking the American oil industry and driving the American oil industry into bankruptcy.

The Congress and the country have been prone to believe that the interests of the country were on the side of imported oil and that the true interests of the Nation as a whole were not in common with the interests of the independent oil industry. The independent oil industry in vain has been trying to tell the Congress and the people that the oil industry was being monopolized and that all independent competition was being driven out of business. The few monopolistic oil companies have not only welcomed but have been forcing the present bankruptcy of the oil industry. These companies are taking advantage of the situation in order to buy up the oil industry of this country at bankrupt prices. In actual practice, they are doing little less than stealing the oil industry of the country from individual citizens of the Nation. The importation of foreign oil in competition with the American oil is making it possible to bring about this bankrupt condition. Common experience teaches us that when the oil industry is completely controlled and monopolized by a few companies, the gasoline-consuming public will be bled white.

Congress and the people in the non-oil-producing States have not been inclined to accept this fair warning from those of us of the independent oil industry. The Congress and the people have depreciated our honest pleas with the thought that we were only serving our own selfish interests. Certainly the Congress and the people of the country are willing to accept a plea of guilty on the part of these monopolistic companies that they are at this time deliberately taking advantage of the distressed condition in the oil industry and buying up their independent competition.

According to an article in the New York Times of to-day, December 18, 1931, the Gulf Oil Co., one of the four great importers, enters its plea of guilty to carrying on a campaign of piracy to destroy the great independent oil industry. The article in the Times is as follows:

SPECIAL TO THE NEW YORK TIMES

PITTSBURGH, PA., December 18.—The Gulf Oil Corporation has taken advantage of the depression to increase its extensive holdings by buying additional oil lands and refineries at bargain prices, an official of the company said to-day in explaining omission of the dividend on its capital stock. He said the passing of the dividend was a difficult step to take, but he predicted that it would be recognized as the most desirable policy for the stockholders from a long-range viewpoint. The Mellon family has large holdings in the company.

Gulf's large surplus, accumulated through years of big profits and small dividends, is represented by new oil wells, new pipe lines, new refineries, and new distributing units and not by cash. It is shown that Gulf is not only completing expansion started in the last year, but is taking advantage of the demoralized condition of the industry and is picking up distressed properties that will have great value when overproduction is ended.

Purchases being made by Gulf are not confined to any particular phase of the oil industry. They are in the distributing as well as the producing end of the business. Every acquisition is being made in considering the future and not the immediate return.

No estimate of the results of Gulf Oil for the present year can be made at this time. Reports must be received from Mexico, Venezuela, various parts of Europe, and the Far East before earnings can be known.

The New York Times is a free-trade paper; it is an international paper rather than a national paper. It has always opposed a tariff on oil; therefore, I take it that no one will question the validity of this article since it appeared in the New York Times. This brazen, defiant statement of the Gulf Co. is in perfect keeping with the public advertisement on March 13, 1931, of the Republic Shares Corporation, of Chicago, Ill. This corporation was interested in Standard Oil stocks. To prove to prospective stockholders that Standard Oil stock would be profitable, it stated that the Standard Oil companies were fast grabbing up the oil industry in this country. That advertisement was as follows:

THE OIL SITUATION

The time to push our Standard Oil Trust is now. Papers refer to the present situation as a "crisis in the oil business." Do not let yourself be disturbed by that. It is just when these cries do occur that Standard Oil gets the benefit of its dominating position.

We want you to bear in mind that the crisis is not for the Standard Oil companies, but rather for the independent producers and also for numerous of the good-sized concerns—the latter being concerns whose activities do not cover every angle of the oil business, such as is the case with the Standard Oil Co.

The so-called "crisis" is brought about by reason of the fact that for years the independents and those concerns who confine themselves to producing oil, have gone hog-wild in driving more wells and bringing in more oil than the world could consume. When these independents and other producers heretofore could not get a good market for their oil, they always turned for an outlet to Standard Oil Co. because of its millions of cash reserves and because of its storage facilities. Therefore, when the price got sufficiently low to interest the Standard Oil, it would step into the market and buy, and later on, as the market improved, it would sell.

This, therefore, is the time to push our Standard Oil Trust and to make valuable friends while so doing.

In the light of these two public statements this Congress and the people of the United States can not permit this session of Congress to adjourn without protecting the American market for the American oil industry unless this Congress and the people of the United States are perfectly willing to permit one of the four largest of American industries to be owned and controlled by a few monopolistic companies. If the American oil industry is monopolized, it will be more powerful than the Government. It will be powerful enough to rob the people, and it will be powerful enough to control and dominate government. Through the medium of spreading false propaganda the four great importing companies are now almost large enough to control and dominate government; at least, they are large enough to mislead the people and to mislead the Congress and thereby to attain their will.

THE OIL TARIFF

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the oil tariff and to insert two short articles.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following articles published in the Washington Post December 19, 1931, entitled "Oil Output Slash Expected at Once," and in the New York Times December 18, 1931, entitled "Gulf Oils Dividend Put Into Bargains":

[From the Washington Post, December 19, 1931]

OIL OUTPUT SLASH EXPECTED AT ONCE—ACTION TO BALANCE MARKET IS DUE FOLLOWING PARLEY OF TRADE LEADERS

ST. LOUIS, December 18 (A. P.).—Reduction in production of crude oil to bring operations in the industry in line with consumption, and thus prevent further price reductions and general demoralization, is expected immediately as a result of the 2-day meeting of the directors of the American Petroleum Institute, which ended late to-day.

No general agreement was made, it was announced, nor was the problem, said by leaders to be the most acute the industry ever faced, approached with that in view, because such an agreement would violate the antitrust laws. Leading companies, however, announced individually they would shut down Sundays in the flush fields, principally in Texas, with a view to reducing production 1,400,000 barrels a week. This will be necessary to stave off a further reduction after the first of the year of about 40 cents a barrel in the mid-continent area, leaders said.

The Humble Oil & Refining Co., with about 100,000 barrels production a day, and one of the largest in Texas, together with the Sun Oil Co., took the lead in announcing the Sunday shut-down policy, effective at once. The Ohio Oil Co., which operates in Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, and other States; the Phillips Petroleum Co.; and the Sinclair Consolidated Oil Corporation followed suit with similar announcements.

[From the New York Times, December 18, 1931]

GULF OIL'S DIVIDENDS PUT INTO BARGAINS—COMPANY OMITTED PAYMENT TO PICK UP PROPERTIES AT LOW PRICES, OFFICIAL SAYS

PITTSBURGH, December 18.—The Gulf Oil Corporation has taken advantage of the depression to increase its extensive holdings by buying additional oil lands and refineries at bargain prices, an official of the company said to-day in explaining omission of the dividend on its capital stock. He said the passing of the dividend was a difficult step to take, but he predicted that it would be recognized as the most desirable policy for the stockholders from a long-range viewpoint. The Mellon family has large holdings in the company.

Gulf's large surplus, accumulated through years of big profits and small dividends, is represented by new oil wells, new pipe lines, new refineries, and new distributing units and not by cash.

It is shown that Gulf is not only completing expansion started in the last year but is taking advantage of the demoralized condition of the industry and is picking up distressed properties that will have great value when overproduction is ended.

Purchases being made by Gulf are not confined to any particular phase of the oil industry. They are in the distributing as well as the producing end of the business. Every acquisition is being made in considering the future and not the immediate return.

The annual dividend requirements on 4,525,221 shares of Gulf Oil capital stock outstanding amounted to $6,787,831, at the rate of $1.50 a share, when payment was discontinued at the last meeting of directors. The directors felt it would be better to take advantage of the bargains in properties than to pay this money out to stockholders in 1932. The policy of Gulf Oil during its entire existence has been to consider the development of the organization as a matter of greater importance than current dividend payments.

No estimate of the results of Gulf Oil for the present year can be made at this time. Reports must be received from Mexico, Venezuela, various parts of Europe, and the Far East before earnings can be known. It is generally believed, however, that profits will be smaller than dividends paid for the year.

THE PHILIPPINE PROBLEM A MAJOR AMERICAN PROBLEM

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the Philippine problem.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Delegate from the Philippine Islands?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following address delivered by me on the opening day of the Progressive Conference, held at Washington, D. C., March 11, 1931:

When the Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands received the kind invitation of Senators NORRIS, COSTIGAN, LA FOLLETTE, WHEELER, and CUTTING to this conference, we accepted it with alacrity, and I wish now to take the opportunity to express on behalf of the people whom we represent our gratitude. We did not hesitate to accept the invitation, because we felt that our inclusion in the list of those who were honored with invitations was prompted by the conviction that the Philippine question has a direct bearing on the problems presented for consideration. The early solution of American-Philippine relations, indeed, is wrapped up with the question of tariff, agricultural relief, unemployment, and industrial stabilization, and even the question on return to representative government. The Philippine problem should be considered a major American problem.

The very able address on the tariff by Senator COSTIGAN, to which we have just listened, made reference to the Philippines in relation to the tariff on sugar. During the past few years the beet and cane sugar interests of the United States have been pressing the claim that Philippine sugar is a menace to their interests. From the sugar States emanated the proposal to limit the importation of Philippine sugar duty free to the United States. Later the agitation became widespread and took the form of limiting or taxing sugar, coconut oil, and other products from the Philippine Islands. All these conclusively prove how intimately connected the Philippine question is with the tariff problem.

More recently the dairy interests, especially in connection with the legislative measure amendatory to the old oleomargarine act, have come to realize that Philippine coconut oil competes wth the dairy products of this country. Those interested in vegetable oil and cottonseed oil likewise have come to look upon the Philippines as a serious competitor. The National Grange, the Farm Bureau Federation, the milk and dairy-products associations, and other agricultural interests of this country have come out in favor of granting independence to the Philippine Islands as a means of relief to American agriculture. I wish to assure them that my people rejoice in their stand for Philippine freedom. Let there be no mistake about the position of my people. We value freedom more than tariff protection. We, of course, object most strenuously to the imposition of duty on the products of the Philippine Islands while they are retained under the American flag and while all American products enter the Philippine market free of duty and without limit.

I desire to invite attention to the fact that the solving of the Philippine problem would be an effective means of partially bringing relief to American labor and solve once for all the question of immigration from the Philippines to the United States without resorting to the obnoxious proposals of effecting Filipino exclusion and Filipino restriction while the Philippines remains under the United States.

The Philippine problem, furthermore, is not only intimately linked with the problem of the tariff, the problem of American agriculture, and with your problems of labor and immigration, but it is very vitally related to the problem of unemployment. By turning us loose this country could save from one source the amount of four to ten million dollars annually, an amount which would go a long way toward relieving unemployment in this country. The Secretary of War has admitted a saving of over $4,000,000 a year for military garrisons should the Philippines be granted independence.

I would like to remind you also that the petition of the Filipino people for independence is in thorough accord with the Republican policy enunciated from McKinley to Coolidge; it is in accord with the platform of the Democratic Party, which in 1924 included in its plank the following pronouncement:

"The Filipino people have succeeded in maintaining a stable government and have thus fulfilled the only condition laid down by Congress as prerequisite to the granting of independence. We declare that it is now our liberty and our duty to keep our promise to these people by granting them immediately the independence which they so honorably covet."

I wish particularly to remind the men and women of this conference that the Progressive Party, under the leadership of the great La Follette who has gone to the Great Beyond, that stalwart defender of freedom and friend of the poor and the oppressed, definitely approved the declaration couched in these words:

"Resolved, That we favor the immediate and complete independence of the Philippine Islands, in accordance with the pledges of official representatives of the American people."

For 15 long years no positive, constructive legislation has been enacted definitely to solve the Philippine problem. I plead for definite action on the Philippine question. High moral considerations require it; the labor interests demand it; agricultural organizations need it; those interested in the tariff want it. All the American political parties are pledged to grant us our independence. We have for years been pleading, petitioning, praying and laboring for a definite settlement of the Philippine problem. Why this apathy? Why delay? I ask you on behalf of my people to do what you can to help bring the Philippine question to the fore and secure appropriate action. I earnestly hope that the members of this conference, composed as it is of men and women progressive and liberal minded, will not join the disciples of inaction but become apostles of salvation.

SENATE

MONDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1931

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who at sundry times and in divers manners didst speak unto the fathers by the prophets and who in the fullness of time hath spoken unto us through Thine own Son, reveal to our weakness and distress the power and grace of life betokened by His coming to a weary, waiting world.

Renew in us the purity and innocence of childhood, the flaming zeal of youth, the patient temper of life's riper years, that we, rejoicing in the light that shines about our pathway from the cradle to the grave, may brighten sadness, cheer the faint, raise the fallen, and make happiness abound. Enable us to carry hence the inward peace and strength that now are ours, that by walking in Thy presence here a while we may learn to walk more patiently with man. We ask it in the name of Him who hath walked this way before, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

CLAUDE G. BOWERS ON THE MORATORIUM

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial by Claude G. Bowers, which appeared in the Washington Times of December 19, entitled "A Piece of Outrageous Effrontery."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Times of December 19, 1931]

A PIECE OF OUTRAGEOUS EFFRONTERY

By Claude G. Bowers

That was a remarkable scene in the House at Washington when the erstwhile Republican chairman of the Committee on Banking, Mr. MCFADDEN, of Pennsylvania, made a slashing attack upon the President. The purport of his attack was that the President had betrayed or "sold" his country in the interest of the international bankers, and that the price of the betrayal was the support of these bankers in the campaign of 1928.

Of course, the speaker was right in insisting that the international bankers, having made bad loans in Europe, want the billions in debts transferred from the backs of the Europeans to the backs of the American taxpayers to make easier the collection of the private loans. But the charge that this was part of a bargain entered into in 1928 implies the most appalling corruption and should not have been made without positive proof. For, if true, there is a clear case for impeachment.

The excitement during the incident must have turned on this specific charge, for certainly no Member of the House doubts that the pressure of the bankers is responsible for the thoroughly organized propaganda in favor of making the American taxpayers pay the war debts of the world. That is common knowledge and has been said a million times.

The extreme charge of MCFADDEN does not alter the fact that this is precisely the fight that is being waged to-day.

SENATOR REED'S STATEMENT

Mr. MCFADDEN is a traditional foe of Mr. Mellon, but Senator REED, of Pennsylvania, is his traditional friend and a warm supporter of the administration in the past. He is a corporation lawyer of distinction and can not be accused either of making loose statements or of playing to "the mob."

And on the day MCFADDEN was making his speech in the House REED was saying in the Senate:

"There is the other kind of propaganda coming from our own citizens who are interested chiefly in their own pocketbooks and in profits they will get from cancellation of debts due our Government. I refer principally to those bankers and bond houses who since the armistice and debt settlement have put out so-called private loans to European nations, which they now would like to see paid by means of cancellation."

Thus far Senator REED takes precisely the same position that MCFADDEN took. There is no occasion for excitement or "indignation" about the statement, for everyone knows it to be true.

And then Senator REED continues:

"They [the loans] were made by American bankers with eyes wide open to the situation of the debtor countries, with full knowledge of the prior existence of this Government's claim and the difficulty that the debtors would have in meeting both public and private debts. Now, to ask that those private claims of some American citizens should be given priority over the intergovernmental claims, which are the claims of all American citizens, seems to me to be a piece of outrageous effrontery."

"Outrageous effrontery." That is language almost as strong as MCFADDEN used.

AND WHO ASKS THE REVIVAL?

True it is that Senator REED does not accuse the President of "outrageous effrontery" in words; but he does by implication. For when he was asked if he favors the revival of the War Debts Commission he replied:

"I do not. It can have but one result, and that is a further reduction of the amounts due the United States. Nobody suggests that we shall review those debts with a view to finding an increased capacity to pay on the part of any debtor."

Thus he says that the manifest purpose in reviving the War Debts Commission is to scale down the debts and transfer the amount "forgiven" to the backs of the taxpayers of the United States.

And who asks the revival? President Hoover.

Thus by indirection, but none the less clearly, he says that the President's proposal about the revival of the commission is a "piece of outrageous effrontery."

MUCH MORE INVOLVED

To old-fashioned Americans there is much more involved in the manifest plan of the administration than the loss of billions to the American people to be made up by the taxation of the American people by billions to pay the debts of other nations. This is wicked enough in view of our condition, with our economic collapse, with our enormous deficit in the Treasury, with the appalling increases in taxation to meet this deficit. But there is a more serious theory of Government involved. Are private interests, in a hole, to be permitted to use the instrumentalities of Government to save their investments without the loss of a penny to themselves by going into the pockets of all the American people by law? Is the American Government a subordinate agency of high finance, or its property?

Through no fault of their own there are almost 7,000,000 breadwinners out of work and in need, but the Government can do nothing for them. There are many millions of women and children without enough to eat or wear, but the Government can not go into the Treasury for them.

To take money from the pockets of all the people by way of the Treasury for these victims of an economic collapse for which they are not responsible is denounced with deep feeling as a "vicious dole."

Many are wondering by what sophistry it becomes a beneficent dole to go into the pockets of the people to the tune of billions to make good the investments for handsome profit of the international bankers.

A MOST GLARING ILLUSTRATION

And unlike the millions who are victims of the stupidities of economic policies, for which they are not responsible, these international bankers knew precisely what they were about. As Senator REED well says, these bankers went into these loans they want made good through the transfer of the war debts of the world to the American taxpayers, with eyes wide open to the conditions.

They gambled with their money on the possibilities of repayment; and the public generally is wondering if in their calculation on the possibilities they counted confidently on their capacity to use the Government of the United States to guarantee their profits; the very Government which makes a virtue of its refusal to guarantee bread to hungry women and children.

For 50 years and more private interests have used Government in America to increase profits by law out of the pockets of the people; but here is a most glaring illustration, and the effect on the public or mass mind is doing no good to the international bankers.

APPROPRIATION FOR EMPLOYMENT SERVICE, DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on House Joint Resolution 142, which was read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 19, 1931.

Resolved, That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 142) making an additional appropriation for the Employment Service, Department of Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter stricken out by such Senate amendment insert the following:

": Provided further, That no salary shall be paid under this appropriation at a rate in excess of $2,000 per annum."

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I stated on the floor the other day, the Secretary of Labor assured the members of the House committee and also the Senate committee that he would not pay any salary of more than $2,000 under the $120,000 appropriation. The House committee in reporting its bill apparently acted on that theory, because it made no limit. The House did add a limitation. We struck it out. The House now inserts a limitation applying only to the money carried by this bill. This might be considered a doubt on the part of the House of the word of the Secretary of Labor. I can hardly think the House intended it as such. However, as the amendment simply carries out what the Secretary of Labor assured us would be done, and as it is urgent that we get action on this bill and as the Secretary is anxious for prompt action, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the Senate amendment.

The amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE ON SENATORIAL CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, from the Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures, pursuant to Senate Resolution 215 of the last Congress, I submit a report (No. 20), which I send to the desk. I ask that it may be printed and placed upon the desk of each Senator to-morrow morning, and also that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 20, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

SENATORIAL CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES, 1930

Mr. NYE, from the Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures, submitted the following final report (pursuant to S. Res. 215):

The Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures has previously submitted reports covering certain of the specific investigations which it has conducted in accordance with the provisions of Senate Resolution 215. In this report it is dealing only with the findings of the committee as a result of its more complete investigation and without regard to specific contests.

It is recognized that the primary purpose of the resolutions which authorized these investigations was that of affording possible legislative remedies for the evils which may have developed by reason of the use of money in elections. The purpose of the present report is, therefore, primarily to submit our recommendations for constructive legislation.

The committee finds, as a result of its investigations and examination of the incomplete returns filed under existing law, that there was expended in connection with the election of United States Senators in 1930 a total of $5,505,712.

The excessive character of these expenditures will be evident when it is understood that the annual salaries of all the Senators elected in this campaign would amount to only $350,000. The expenditures were thus more than fifteen times the amount of the annual salaries of the offices sought.

A considerable part of these expenditures, it is true, were made in behalf of tickets upon which other candidates were running, both in the primary and in the general election. Nevertheless, as many witnesses testified, it is doubtful if the total expenditures would have been greatly reduced if the senatorial candidates had been running alone.

This is more than offset by the fact that in 15 States, in which 17 Senators were elected, the expenditures, as reported, were small or moderate in size. The bulk of the expenditures, aggregating $4,898,121, was therefore concentrated in 18 States, in which the amounts expended ranged from $63,375 to $2,005,033.

Without going further into detail as regards either the amount or the character of these campaign expenditures, it would appear that in a majority of the States they were excessive, when measured by any reasonable standard. The use of such large sums is incompatible with a free and uncontrolled expression of the will of the people and with the maintenance of even a semblance of that equality of opportunity for citizens to seek public office, which is the very foundation of genuine democracy.

EXTENT AND CHARACTER OF INVESTIGATIONS

The investigations of the Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures indicate clearly that while this situation is due in part to the increasingly complex and expensive character of political campaigns in the United States, it is even more largely the result of the defective character of the existing law, which imposes substantially no limitation upon expenditures and does not even provide effective publicity as to the source of contributions or the amount and character of expenditures as now reported under existing law.

These investigations of the committee covered 18 States, in which 408 witnesses were publicly examined, while several hundred more were privately interviewed by the committee's representatives. They included almost every section of the country, and examined, with equal impartiality and freedom from partisan bias, all substantial charges preferred in accordance with the terms of Senate Resolutions 215 and 403, creating the committee and defining its purposes.

The committee, therefore, has had an adequate opportunity to examine the operation of the present law and ascertain its defects. In addition, in a special series of public hearings held after its field investigations had been concluded, the committee heard the testimony of a number of the leading authorities in American universities on political science and the law of elections and received their recommendations. Although they differed upon minor points, they were in harmony in declaring that the present law is defective and that the practically uncontrolled expenditures which it permits constitute a serious menace to representative government in the United States.

DEFECTS OF EXISTING LAW

Some of the principal defects in the existing law—the Federal corrupt practices act of 1925—as revealed by the committee's investigations are:

1. It makes no attempt to limit or to provide publicity for expenditures in primary elections.

In more than half the States and congressional districts the nomination is equivalent to election. In nearly every State, moreover, the contest for the nomination is likely to be as bitterly fought and to involve as large expenditures as the general election.

2. It fails to place any effective limitation upon campaign contributions and expenditures even in the general election.

3. It does not fix responsibility clearly either for improper expenditures or for failure to file reports, and thus makes effective enforcement extremely difficult.

4. Its provisions regarding the reporting of contributions and expenditures are confusing and provide many opportunities for evasion.

5. It fails to provide effective publicity even for the reports filed in accordance with its provisions.

6. It does not reach large numbers of national and local organizations, which, while not directly supporting particular candidates, frequently exercise a controlling influence over elections.

7. It is ineffective both in controlling and requiring adequate publicity of the expenditures made in presidential elections.

8. It provides no adequate means either of checking the reports that are made or of enforcing the penalties prescribed for its violation.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMITTEE

In order to remedy these defects in the existing law and provide in future not only effective publicity for campaign contributions and expenditures but also a reasonable measure of control over their amount and character, the committee, in accordance with the provisions of Senate Resolution 215, submits herewith its recommendations in the form of a bill, together with a statement of the considerations underlying its principal provisions.

The bill submitted herewith is based upon a draft prepared at the request of the chairman by Prof. James K. Pollock, of the University of Michigan. It embodies, in its revised form, suggestions made by Prof. Charles E. Merriam, of the University of Chicago; Prof. Earl R. Sikes, of Dartmouth College; Prof. Charles E. Beard, formerly of Columbia University; Prof. Louise Overacker, of Wellesley College; and other leading authorities upon the law of elections, as well as many features based upon investigations conducted during the past year by the committee.

The work of digesting and analyzing the evidence before the committee and of preparing the bill in the form in which it is submitted has been directed by Mr. Basil Manly, former joint chairman, with Chief Justice William Howard Taft, of the National War Labor Board.

This draft includes the principal recommendations contained in the reports of former Senators William S. Kenyon and James A. Reed and Senators WILLIAM E. BORAH and FREDERICK STEIWER, as chairmen of the several select committees on campaign expenditures which have been authorized by the Senate during the past 10 years.

A thorough study has likewise been made of all the bills dealing with corrupt practices and campaign expenditures that have been introduced in the Senate and House of Representatives during the past quarter of a century and the results are incorporated in the present revised draft.

The purpose of the bill as drafted is primarily to fix responsibility for campaign expenditures and to require the filing of complete and accurate reports of the contributions received and expenditures made on behalf of every candidate for Federal office.

CONTROL OF NOMINATIONS AND ELECTIONS

The bill attempts, without conflicting directly with the decision of the Supreme Court in the Newberry case, to establish proper limitations upon the expenditures that may be made in campaigns for nomination and election by candidates for President and Vice President of the United States as well as by Senators and Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners in Congress.

This purpose, it is believed, may be achieved by the application of the following principles:

1. The election process, from the time a candidate announces his candidacy or takes any other step looking toward his ultimate election, is a single process, regardless of the method which may be used in any State to determine the will of the electors.

The corruption of any part of this process is a corruption of the whole. This principle was enunciated by Justices Pitney, Brandeis, and Clark in their dissenting opinion in the Newberry case in the following language:

"It seems to me too clear for discussion that primary elections and nominating conventions are so closely related to the final election, and their proper regulation so essential to effective regulation of the latter, so vital to representative government, that power to regulate them is within the general authority of Congress.

"An election is the choosing of a person by vote to fill a public office. In the nature of things it is a complex process, involving some examination of the qualifications of those by whom it is to be made; some opportunity for the electors to consider and canvass the claims of the eligibles; and some method of narrowing the choice by eliminating candidates until one finally secures a majority, or at least a plurality, of the votes. For the process of elimination, instead of tentative elections participated in by all the electors, nominations by parties or groups of citizens have obtained in the United States from an early period. Latterly the processes of nomination have been regulated by law in many of the States through the establishment of official primary elections. But in the essential sense, a sense that fairly comports with the object and purpose of a Constitution such as ours, which deals in broad outline with matters of substance and is remarkable for succinct and pithy modes of expression, all of the various processes above indicated fall fairly within the definition of 'the manner of holding elections.' This is not giving to the word 'elections' a significance different from that which it bore when the Constitution was adopted, but is simply recognizing a content that of necessity always inhered in it. The nature of that instrument required, as Chief Justice Marshall pointed out in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316, 407), 'that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves.'"

Chief Justice White, in a separate dissenting opinion, also strongly emphasized the essential unity of the entire election process and the necessity for protecting it from possible corruption at every point. He said:

"In view, then, of the plain text of the Constitution, of the power exerted under it from the beginning, of the action of Congress in its legislation, and of the amendment to the Constitution, as well as of the legislative action of substantially the larger portion of the States, I can see no reason for now denying the power of Congress to regulate a subject which from its very nature inheres in and is concerned with the election of Senators of the United States as provided by the Constitution."

"Corruption in elections," as John Adams said, "is the great enemy of freedom." To permit any part of the election process to remain subject to corruption or to the effect of excessive expenditure of money is to subject the essential structure of the Federal Government to dangerous and subversive influences which will in the course of time destroy it.

Article I, section 4, of the Constitution, providing that the Congress shall regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, if given the broad and liberal interpretation which the Supreme Court has almost uniformly given to those clauses which relate to the structure of the Federal Government and the powers of its coordinate branches, must be held to confer upon Congress the power of protecting the entire election process for these offices from corruption and merely the casting and counting of the ballots at the general election. So likewise, as is pointed out below, it must be held that the Congress has all the power necessary to protect the offices of President and Vice President of the United States from becoming the objects of barter and sale, in order that the chief executive office of the Nation may not be corrupted or procured by the expenditure of excessive sums of money.

2. The draft of the bill incorporates also the suggestion contained in the recent decision of Federal Judge Munger in the case of United States v. Victor Seymour to the effect that it would be within the constitutional power of Congress to provide that no candidate shall be entitled to have his name appear upon the official ballot in the general election, unless such candidate shall have complied with such reasonable regulations as may be made by the Congress limiting the amount of money to be expended in the primary election and prescribing the statements of expenditures that shall be filed.

After reviewing all the principal Federal decisions relating to the control of elections, including the Newberry case, Judge Munger declared:

"In view of these decisions, it is not perceived why Congress may not enact valid legislation providing that the manner of elections for Senators and Representatives shall be by the use of a printed official ballot, that upon such ballot there shall be printed the names of those nominees only for such offices as shall have duly made and filed with some public officer a sworn statement of all contributions and expenditures which have been made by or for the benefit of such candidate, to his knowledge, in obtaining the nomination for such office, and the names of those contributing and of those to whom money was paid, also requiring, as a prerequisite to the printing of such nominee's name upon the ballot, that the officers of a campaign committee acting on behalf of such candidate should file a similar statement. As has been indicated, such legislation would be in harmony with the legislation of many States and with other statutory restrictions as to names of candidates upon the printed ballots. (See 9 Rul. Cas. Law, pp. 1054, 1055, 1056.) It would relate directly to the manner of holding the elections for Senators and Representatives."

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

Before entering into a detailed discussion of the provisions of the present bill, it may be well to discuss briefly the principle underlying the sections dealing with the expenditures that may be made on behalf of candidates for President and Vice President of the United States.

Previous legislation has been directed toward the control of expenditures made in connection with the choice of presidential electors. The present bill proceeds on the theory that the offices of President and Vice President of the United States are Federal offices, the protection of which from the taint of corruption is of supreme importance to the welfare of the Nation. Inasmuch as the final choice of the President and Vice President of the United States is reposed by the Constitution in the Congress, which must certify to their election, and, under certain circumstances, actually designate the successful candidates for these offices, it would appear that the Congress must possess the power to enact appropriate legislation to prevent the entire process leading up to such election from contamination by the evils of corruption and excessive campaign expenditures and to require such reports from candidates and committees as may be necessary for its information.

THE FICTION OF THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE

It is true that in the general election the votes are cast nominally for the presidential electors nominated by the several parties. Nevertheless, it is a fact, as every student of American politics acknowledges, that the Electoral College has become a mere fiction. The votes are in reality cast for the candidates for President and Vice President to whom these electors are understood to be committed. In some States, indeed, the names of the presidential electors do not appear on the official ballot, only the names of the presidential and vice presidential candidates being shown. (Testimony of Professor Pollock, hearings on remedial legislation, p. 57.)

Chief Justice White in his opinion in the Newberry case referred to the contrast between the original constitutional plan for the election of the President and the actual process as developed by custom as follows:

"The election of President offers an illustration of the filching of actual power away from the electors in whom it is vested by law. When James Russell Lowell, a Republican elector for Massachusetts in 1876, was urged to exercise his independence and vote for Tilden, he declined, saying that 'Whatever the first intent of the Constitution was, usage had made the presidential electors strictly the instruments of the party which chose them.' The Constitution remains unchanged, yet presidential electors recognize that they have been stripped of all discretion."

While the election of President and Vice President is not completed until the Senate and House of Representatives in joint session canvass the results of the vote cast by the Electoral College, the election process actually begins when the candidates for President and Vice President take the first steps to secure their nominations by the national conventions of the major political parties. Even in the case of independent candidates for President substantially the same situation exists, as such candidates become serious contenders only after they have received the nomination of some form of convention.

The present bill seeks, therefore, to establish proper limitations upon the amounts which may be expended by or on behalf of presidential and vice presidential candidates from the time that their candidacy is initiated, either by public announcement or by some other act, until the votes of the Electoral College are canvassed by the Senate and House of Representatives in joint session. Throughout the period of the presidential candidacy for nomination and election, provision is made for the filing at proper intervals of reports of contributions and expenditures made by or on behalf of such candidates. Generous, but strict, limitations are prescribed for the amounts which may be expended on behalf of such candidates in seeking the nomination and in attempting to procure the choice of electors who are committed to cast their votes for such candidates in the Electoral College.

NOT A GENERAL ELECTIONS LAW

No attempt is made in the present bill to regulate elections in the several States except by the provision of proper limitations upon the amounts which may be expended by the candidates for Federal offices and by the requirement of reports with reference to their expenditures. While the investigations of the Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures have revealed widespread frauds and corruption and gross laxity in the conduct of elections in certain States, nevertheless it is believed that it would be unwise for the Federal Government to attempt to assert the extent and character of control over the conduct of elections in the several States which would be necessary to establish an effective curb upon such corrupt practices. Such a centralization of control over Federal elections might in the course of time result in the intrenchment of a national political machine inimical to the welfare of the Nation.

CENTRALIZATION OF REPORTS

The bill substitutes for the present practice of requiring reports of expenditures to be filed with the President of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives provisions for the creation of a joint committee on elections representatives of the two Houses of Congress, with which all such reports shall be deposited. This plan will avoid the confusion which now exists because of the two places in which reports are required to be filed. It is also in complete harmony with the provision of the Constitution making each House the judge of the elections and qualifications of its Members. All matters relating to Federal elections are thus kept under control of the membership of the two Houses of Congress. The procedure suggested will enable each House to be fully informed regarding expenditures made in connection with the election of its Members, and both Houses to be jointly advised of the facts relative to the election of the President and Vice President of the United States.

The creation of such a joint committee on elections is in conformity with the established practice of the House and Senate. It requires no new and elaborate machinery and involves no question of delegated powers. The detailed provisions of this section insure proper representation of the majority and minority parties and should result in effective scrutiny and widespread publicity of campaign expenditures of all candidates and committees.

Prompt local publicity is secured by providing for the filing of duplicate copies of the reports of expenditures with the clerk of the United States court of the district in which the candidate is located.

NECESSITY FOR FIXING RESPONSIBILITY

The most important departure in principle from the corrupt practices act of 1925 lies in the fact that the present bill seeks to center the responsibility for campaign expenditures upon such candidate or his agent and prohibits all those who are not properly authorized by the candidate or his agent from receiving contributions or making expenditures.

Under this plan the candidate becomes legally responsible for the expenditures of all persons and committees whom he or his agents has authorized to act in his behalf, while all unauthorized persons and committees receiving contributions or making campaign expenditures become subject to the penalties provided in the bill. This will effectively curb the growing activities of "political racketeers" who use the names of popular candidates to enrich themselves.

It is only through such a plan, it is believed, that it will be possible to establish any effective restraint upon political expenditures. Under present conditions it is necessary in practice for prosecuting officers to prove that the candidate had knowledge of all excessive or improper expenditures made in his behalf. This is difficult, if not impossible, in most cases. Under the proposed plan, on the other hand, each candidate becomes responsible for the activities and expenditures of the persons and committees which he has authorized, but he is relieved of responsibility for the acts of all other persons and committees. At the same time all unauthorized persons and committees become subject to severe penalties if they attempt to collect campaign contributions or influence an election by the expenditure of money.

The early passage of this bill or some other adequate revision of the present Federal corrupt practices act is necessary if the presidential and congressional campaigns of 1932 are to be free from the flagrant abuses which the investigations of this and other committees have revealed in connection with previous elections.

(b) No person shall continue to serve as a member of the joint committee after he has ceased to be a member of the committee by which he was chosen, except that the members chosen by the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress who have been reelected to the House of Representatives may continue to serve as members of the joint committee notwithstanding the expiration of the Congress. A vacancy in the joint committee shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the functions of the joint committee and shall be filled in the same manner as the original selection except that (1) in case of a vacancy during an adjournment or recess of Congress for a period of more than two weeks the members of the joint committee who are members of the committee entitled to fill such vacancy may designate a member of such committee to serve until his successor is chosen by such committee, and (2) in the case of a vacancy after the expiration of a Congress which would be filled by the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress; the members of such committee who are continuing to serve as members of the joint committee may designate a person who, immediately prior to such expiration, was a member of such committee and who is reelected to the House of Representatives to serve until his successor is chosen by such committee.

SEC. 4. (a) It shall be unlawful for any expenses to be incurred or for any expenditures to be made for the purpose of promoting or influencing the nomination or election of any candidate within the scope of this act, except by the persons authorized under the provisions of this section and by the committees provided for in section 17. Any person or persons making expenditures in violation of this provision shall be subject to the penalties set forth in sections 36 and 37.

(b) Every candidate, before making or authorizing any expenditures in connection with his candidacy for the nomination, and, if he nominated, also immediately after his nomination, shall appoint an agent who, except as hereinafter provided, shall thereafter be the only person authorized to solicit or receive contributions or incur expenses or disburse money for the purpose of promoting or influencing the nomination or election of such candidate.

(c) A candidate may name himself or some other person as agent, or he may designate a political committee to act as his agent. In case a committee is designated, only its treasurer may solicit or receive contributions or incur expenses or disburse money, except as provided by paragraph (d) of this section.

(d) It shall be unlawful for any person except the agent of a candidate to solicit or receive contributions or incur any expenses or disburse money in promoting or procuring either directly or indirectly the nomination or election of any candidate, unless he is authorized in writing by the agent, which authorization shall state the maximum amount to be received and/or expended: Provided, That this shall not be interpreted to prohibit any individual citizen from expending his own funds to pay his own individual expenses in connection with a political campaign or to prohibit any individual from expending his own funds to express his views regarding any candidate or any political issue, each such individual being held responsible, however, for reporting such expenditures in accordance with the provisions of section 10 of this act.

(e) Any contributions or expenditures authorized as aforesaid by the agent shall be duly returned as a part of the candidate's receipts or expenditures and are included within the limitations set forth in this act.

(f) In case a candidate appoints as his agent an agent or a committee which is also acting in behalf of another candidate or other candidates for any public office, either within or without the scope of this act, said agent or committee shall make a return of the aggregate contributions and expenditures for all candidates in whose behalf said agent or committee acts, and for each candidate within the terms of this act shall allocate as accurately as possible the joint expenditures to the account of each candidate, in addition to listing the receipts and expenditures which are individual to each candidate. The method or rule of apportionment for joint expenditures as between candidates shall be stated in each candidate's or committee's report as hereinafter provided. In no case shall the joint expenditures made by said agent or committee on behalf of a group of candidates exceed twice the aggregate amount allowed by this act for the candidates for the office of United States Senator, Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner in Congress included within such group.

SEC. 5. (a) The agent of every candidate for Senator or Representative or Delegate or Resident Commissioner shall file with the joint committee on elections between 10 and 15 days before the nomination and within 15 days after the nomination, and between 10 and 15 days before the election and within 15 days after the election of such candidate, a complete and true statement containing—

The joint resolution authorizes the distribution of wheat owned by the Federal Farm Board. We are directed by the committee to ask immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be reported for the information of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let the joint resolution go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah objects. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

REPORT OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Mr. DILL, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1037) to amend the radio act of 1927, approved February 23, 1927, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 23) thereon.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. HEBERT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Roy St. Lewis, of Oklahoma, to be Assistant Attorney General, to succeed George R. Farnum, resigned, which was placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. HASTINGS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of James Alger Fee, of Oregon, to be United States district judge, district of Oregon, to succeed Robert S. Bean, deceased, which was placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of John T. Barrett, of Massachusetts, to be reappointed marshal of the Canal Zone, under the provisions of the Panama Canal act, approved August 24, 1912, which was placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. COUZENS, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, reported favorably the nomination of John Williams, of California, to be a member of the Board of Mediation for a term expiring five years after January 1, 1932 (reappointment), which was placed on the Executive Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nomination of William E. Lee, of Idaho, to be an interstate commerce commissioner for the term expiring December 31, 1938 (reappointment), and of Balthasar H. Meyer, of Wisconsin, to be an interstate commerce commissioner for the term expiring December 31, 1938 (reappointment), which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

EMPLOYMENT OF ATTORNEY BY POWER COMMISSION

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senate leaves the order of reports of committees, I should like to make a statement, so that when later in the day I call up the matter I have in mind, Senators will understand what the Judiciary Committee is trying to do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the statement of the Senator from Nebraska being made at this time? The Chair hears none, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not wish now to report the bill I have in mind, but am waiting for some information to be received later in the day which is being prepared. I shall ask the Senate for unanimous consent at that time for the consideration of the bill which the Judiciary Committee has directed me to report. The report will be unanimous.

The facts are that the Power Commission are desirous of employing an attorney and the Department of Justice desire that the attorney they select shall be appointed. He is an attorney in general practice, and has some cases pending against the United States, with no relation whatever to the matter in dispute in the case where it is desired to appoint him as special attorney, yet his appointment would be a violation of the statute that we have enacted. We desire to follow the same procedure and the committee have directed me to report a measure providing the same procedure as was taken when the Senate authorized the selection of Mr. Roberts, now a justice of the Supreme Court, in the case in which he represented the Senate. The matter involved is one of considerable importance because the litigation is now pending, and the immediate attention of the attorney is absolutely necessary. We shall have to pass a joint resolution or a bill—it will be a bill, I think—to-day in order to transmit it to the House so that they may act on it to-morrow.

CHANGE IN MONETARY SYSTEMS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the pulp industry in my State has been developing in the last few years very greatly, but the change in the monetary system of British Columbia is having a very detrimental effect upon that industry and it is threatened with bankruptcy. Very likely many other products of our country are threatened along the same lines.

I have prepared a bill which, I hope, may take care of the situation. It proposes to empower the Tariff Commission to ascertain the value of imports prior to changes in monetary standards and subsequent thereto, and to levy additional duties.

It may be contended that that involves a delegation of legislative power, but I lay down a very concrete, definite, and fixed rule to control and govern the Tariff Commission, so that I think that objection is met by the terms of the bill itself. I ask that the bill may be read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to reading the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2350) to stabilize the value of imports from countries changing their monetary standards, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Tariff Commission be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed, with the approval of the President, to levy upon all products, whether now on the free or dutiable list, imported from a country, including its dependencies, that has changed its monetary standard within two years prior to the passage of this act, or may hereafter make such change, an additional tariff duty approximately equal to the difference between the value, as defined in section 402 of the tariff act of 1930 (46 Stat. L. 708) of such imports prior to such change in monetary standard and such value of such imports after such change in monetary standard: Provided, That upon the expiration of three months from the time when any country returns to its original monetary standard such additional tariff shall cease upon articles imported from such country.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 6172. An act to amend the Federal farm loan act, as amended, to provide for additional capital for Federal land banks, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

H. R. 6285. An act relating to the contributions of the United States toward defraying the expenses of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. SHEPPARD, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2278) authorizing the Secretary of War to reduce the penalty of the bond of the Brazos River and Harbor navigation district, of Brazoria County, Tex., furnished as surety for its doing certain work on the improvement of Freeport Harbor, Tex., and it was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, a few days ago—on December 14—I introduced Senate bill 1637, a bill to create a United States monetary conference committee, to prescribe the duties thereof, and for other purposes, and asked that it be referred to the Committee on Finance. Since it has to do with an international body, it has seemed to me more appropriate that it should go to the Foreign Relations Committee. I have talked with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the chairman of the Finance Committee, and he has no objection. I therefore ask that it may be rereferred to the Foreign Relations Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the bill referred to by him, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROPOSED HOLIDAY RECESS—AMENDMENT

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to House Concurrent Resolution No. 5, fixing the time of adjournment of Congress for Christmas holidays, to strike out "January 4, 1932," and insert "December 28, 1931." I understand the concurrent resolution for the holiday adjournment has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, so I ask that the amendment be referred also to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6172) to amend the Federal farm loan act, as amended, to provide for additional capital for Federal land banks, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF CAUSES OF DEPRESSION

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I submit a concurrent resolution and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 5), as follows:

Whereas the country is suffering from the most profound industrial depression in its history, entailing enormous losses and widespread unemployment; and

Whereas many different causes have been assigned by economists, financiers, and other students of business and public affairs for the condition to which reference has been made; and

Whereas the condition referred to became generally evident after and was greatly intensified by the debacle on the New York Stock Exchange in the month of October, 1929; and

Whereas the sudden collapse of prices of securities dealt in on the said exchange was preceded by an extraordinary inflation in the prices of such securities and of loans through which transactions therein were effected, was accompanied by a tremendous contraction in bank credits and was followed by a rapid and continuing fall in the prices of commodities generally and particularly of agricultural products; and

Whereas measures to avert the recurrence of similar catastrophes, and to alleviate the disastrous results of the existing crisis can be predicated only upon an accurate knowledge and appreciation of the causes giving rise to the same: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee, consisting of five Members of the Senate and five Members of the House of Representatives, be appointed, the House Members by the Speaker thereof and the Senate Members by the Vice President, and that the said committee be, and it hereby is, authorized to inquire into the causes of the depression so existing, and particularly the relation of the collapse of prices of securities dealt in on the said stock exchange, to hear and take testimony concerning the means that should be employed and the legislation that should be enacted either to prevent a recurrence of such periods of depression or to lessen or reduce the malign effects thereof.

The said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper and to require the attendance of witnesses by subpœnas or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ stenographers, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to and sign subpœnas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee, or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation, shall be punished as prescribed by law. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $20,000, shall be paid the one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Montana a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not hear the first part of the resolution read. Is it proposed that the Senate Finance Committee shall conduct the investigation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The resolution provides that a joint committee of the House and Senate shall be appointed to conduct the investigation, the members of the committee on the part of the House to be appointed by the Speaker of that body and the members of the committee on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Vice President.

Mr. HARRISON. I had been under the impression that an investigation, in large part touching some of the matters covered by the Senator's resolution, was under way by the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate. I merely wondered, if that is true, in order to avoid any overlapping of work—and all the committees are pretty much at work—the Senator would not be willing, so far as the Senate is concerned, to let the Banking and Currency Committee conduct the investigation. I know that committee has had a number of witnesses before it and has been carrying on quite a considerable investigation regarding the subject matter referred to in the concurrent resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, there are a number of committees engaged in specific investigations within the scope of this concurrent resolution, but none of them undertake to make such a comprehensive survey as is contemplated by it. The Committee on Manufactures has been prosecuting some very valuable inquiries that might easily fall within the scope of the concurrent resolution presented by me. I imagine very likely that if a joint committee were appointed it would avail itself of whatever facts were disclosed by any other committee and would, of course, endeavor to avoid duplication of effort. I should have no objection whatever to having the investigation carried on by the Finance Committee, but it did not seem to me that it fell particularly within the scope of the work of that committee any more than half a dozen other committees.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator that all I know about the resolution was that I read in the morning newspapers about the Senator's proposed resolution and that he would ask that it be referred to the Finance Committee. I had very much hoped that he would not do that, because the Finance Committee has got to consider taxation measures and many other questions of importance that are coming up. So I had thought that the Banking and Currency Committee, because of the fact that it had been carrying on such an investigation for some time, at least covering some of the major propositions the Senator seeks to have investigated, would be a more appropriate committee to conduct the proposed investigation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I quite agree with the statement made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. The Finance Committee has about all it can handle. To conduct the investigation proposed by the resolution of the Senator from Montana will take a great deal of time if it is carried to the end the Senator desires.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I trust, Mr. President, the Senate will not give too much significance or importance to anything that may have appeared in the newspapers about this matter. How the newspapers discovered that I had it in mind to submit a resolution of this character is a mystery to me; I have no idea about it. So I say to the Senate there was not very much basis or authority for the information that appeared in the newspapers.

Mr. HARRISON. I see now from the concurrent resolution itself that perhaps the newspapers were mistaken.

PROPOSED REPRESENTATION OF CANADA ON FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD—STABILIZATION OF CURRENCY

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 118) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is requested to enter into negotiations with the Government of the Dominion of Canada with a view to the conclusion of a treaty with that Government, under the terms of which (1) a representative of the Government of Canada, appointed by the Governor General, with the consent of the Canadian Parliament, shall be a member of the Federal Reserve Board of the United States, and (2) provision shall be made for the stabilization of the currency of Canada at a parity of value with the similar standard currency of the United States, and for the maintenance of such parity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BORAH subsequently said:

Mr. President, as I understand, the resolution submitted by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was the reference made.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Chair think that that resolution ought to be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee? By the terms of the resolution the President of the United States is requested to enter into negotiations and to negotiate a treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not notice that provision of the resolution. That being the case, without objection, the reference will be changed and the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations instead of to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANT CLERK TO THE PATENTS COMMITTEE

Mr. HEBERT submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 119), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents is hereby authorized to employ an additional assistant clerk during the first session of the Seventy-second Congress, he to be paid at the rate of $4,800 per annum out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

REPORT ON LAWLESSNESS IN LAW ENFORCEMENT

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no resolutions coming over from a preceding day, the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, on Saturday last I submitted Senate Resolution 116 which I meant to have go over until to-day. It does not appear in any form on the printed calendar. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered as having gone over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 116) submitted by Mr. CUTTING, Mr. WALSH of Montana, and Mr. COSTIGAN on the 19th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate any and all reports prepared by experts of the National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement under the direction of Judge William S. Kenyon, chairman of the subcommittee on lawlessness in law enforcement, including any that may have been made touching the cases of Thomas J. Mooney and Warren K. Billings.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator that the resolution be considered as having been introduced and gone over under the rule for one day? If not, the resolution comes up as coming over from a previous day.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar is in order.

PROPOSED HOLIDAY RECESS

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] a question, if I may get his ear.

I understand that the House has passed a concurrent resolution to recess for the holidays and that it is in the Senate. Is that true?

Mr. WATSON. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state that the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Committee on Appropriations made any report of the resolution?

Mr. WATSON. Not yet.

Mr. HARRISON. The concurrent resolution carries a recess beginning to-morrow, I believe, and running over until the 4th of January. There seems to be a great deal of difference of opinion as to the wisdom of a prolonged recess. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has just offered an amendment, I believe, to curtail it to December 28. Of course, Members are making their plans to leave or to stay, according to the action of the House and the Senate.

In order to settle the question, so that Representatives and Senators may make their arrangements, why would it not be a better plan for us to take up and fight out the question as to whether we are going to adjourn until January 4 or until December 28, and settle the question, so that Senators will know what to do?

Personally, I am very much opposed to a long recess of Congress at this particular time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have understood that a precedent has been established to the effect that this concurrent resolution, when offered, will not be debatable. Is that the parliamentary situation in case it should be brought up here?

Mr. WATSON. That is my understanding.

Mr. BORAH. I think a resolution of this kind is debatable, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A resolution to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. WATSON. It is a resolution to fix the time of adjournment. It is not debatable under our rules.

Mr. BORAH. Then let us debate it before it comes in.

Mr. WATSON. I am ready.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator when he intends to bring it up?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I desire to be entirely frank so far as I am individually concerned.

I have been hoping that decently and in order we might pass the moratorium measure through the Senate. I have believed, however, that it is a matter of such importance now, because of the situation respecting it in foreign countries, and the misunderstanding regarding it that seems to prevail in those countries, that we should stay here until we pass it.

I have been accused of threatening Members. I have made no threats, and anything that I have said has carried nothing in the nature of a threat. It was expressing a hope, backed by a large number of Senators, 68 of whom have acquiesced in the support of this proposition, that we might pass it before we leave here, and clear the decks of it for action immediately after the holidays on other measures that I believe now are of very great importance.

The Senator knows very well—he and I have discussed the matter privately—that the House has passed this concurrent resolution to adjourn. He knows that probably four-fifths of the Members of the House have gone home now, because they had understood that no other business would be transacted. He understands, without quoting anybody on the other side, what those in the leadership over there think about this proposition.

I do not want the Senator to get the idea that I am standing in the way. I am entirely willing to remain here every day, so far as that is concerned, adjourning only for Christmas and New Year's. But when the House Members are away, and so many Senators are getting ready to go away—and we had to ask some to come back to-day—the Senator knows as well as I do that even if we remain here it is very doubtful whether anything will be accomplished.

The Senator was at the White House this morning. He is fully aware of the fact that as far as the men there could agree, it was agreed that immediately upon the reassembling of Congress the credit corporation bill should be taken up. That is as far as anybody could go, because the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency are considering it every day, holding hearings every day. They can do no more. It is humanly possible to do no more. Therefore, until that subcommittee can report to the full committee and the full committee can give the measure consideration, it can not be reported to the Senate. In my judgment, however, if there be a concurrence of opinion on the question, it can be reported very shortly after the reconvening of Congress.

The same thing is true of the land-bank measures that are before the Committee on Banking and Currency. I think they can be reported in a very short space of time.

If there be the opinion among us that the whole fabric will crumble in four days if we do not get back here, then I am entirely willing to come back and stay here, and I think every other Senator would be. So far as I am concerned, I have not been able to see why an adjournment on the 22d of December to the 4th of January would endanger the business or the financial structure of the country. If I am wrong in that, I am ready, of course, to yield, but always with the situation confronting us so far as the House is concerned, which we must remember. The Senator has been in the House, and so have I.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator that I appreciate the difficulty of the task of curtailing the recess. I have always voted for long recesses at Christmas time; but there is an extraordinary situation confronting the country at this particular time. I do not think anybody ought to play politics with it. I am perfectly willing to abide by whatever the sense of the Senate and the House is; but the very reasons that are proposed by the Senator from Indiana as to the difficult task ahead of us are the reasons that prompt me to ask the question now, so that we can settle the question of recess.

If we are not going to recess to-morrow night, well and good. If we are, then of course Members can make their arrangements to go away.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, is all this discussion based upon the assumption that the moratorium measure will be enacted before we adjourn for the holidays?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I think there are other questions that are confronting the Senate which are of just as much moment as the moratorium, or more so, really, because, generally speaking, I think we all recognize that the moratorium is going to pass.

Mr. BARKLEY. Those questions, however, do not happen to be before us just now, and the moratorium is before us.

My understanding yesterday was that it was expected that we would vote on the moratorium before taking a recess.

Personally, while the other day, in agreement with the Democratic leader on this side, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I advocated a recess from the 22d until the 4th, in view of the fact that the moratorium joint resolution is now before us—it was not out of the committee at that time—I certainly should vote against adjourning to-morrow night if we have not acted upon it by that time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it must be perfectly apparent to everyone that if the Senate adjourns, the committees will not continue their work. The committee members will not be here; and therefore we will come back here on the 4th of January with no progress whatever upon the part of the committees.

Mr. President, the moratorium is now before us. I favor the moratorium; but there is no reason why the moratorium should be shoved through here under the lash, and then we should adjourn for two weeks and leave matters undetermined which, in my judgment, under the peculiar conditions which exist at this time, are far more important in the matter of time than the moratorium itself. Therefore it seems to me that we ought to stay here, and it is my belief that the great majority of the Senate want to stay here.

I am not asking for continuation of our sessions beyond to-morrow night, but, when we do adjourn to-morrow, that we come back here upon the 28th of December, which is a week hence.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think it is possible to bring the debate or discussion of the moratorium to a close by to-morrow night?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether it is or not; but there has been talk about all-night sessions, and so forth. There is no justification for that sort of thing and then adjourning for two weeks.

Mr. DILL. There is no justification for an all-night session anyhow, is there?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we ought to proceed in an orderly way in the consideration of all these matters, but stay here for the purpose of considering them. We have now on the verge of being reported some three or four measures which undoubtedly would be reported out beginning next Monday; and we would be in the course of considering them, and some of them would be disposed of long before the 4th day of January. I feel that we ought to stay here.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am equally interested in this question with the Senators who have preceded me. Unfortunately, due to an unavoidable engagement, I was not present at the White House breakfast this morning, and I am unable, therefore, to say just what program there was agreed to, as has been indicated by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator long enough to say that the moratorium was not mentioned.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was not mentioned?

Mr. WATSON. It was not mentioned.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, somebody showed a wise discretion, then. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I am ready to stay here continuously, so far as I am concerned. I will stay here to-morrow, the next day, the next day, Christmas Day if you wish, Sunday if you desire, and every other day that may be suggested. There is one thing, though, to which I take exception—I do not like to read, as I read yesterday in every newspaper in this country, that to-day, when for the first time a measure comes before us that is going to put upon the backs of American taxpayers $250,000,000, we are to be held all night here in session, continuously, until we pass it. We are to be lashed by those who desire to take Europe's debt and put it on America—we are to be lashed into submission by the mere inability physically to present our case.

That I object to. I will remain here every day; but I want the orderly processes of the Senate observed and the right of those who desire to debate the moratorium to debate it before the Senate, and debate it legitimately and just as they desire.

No filibuster do I wish. None would I indulge; but I do insist that I shall not be kept here all night long at the behest of somebody within or without this Chamber; and on a question that is of extraordinary and transcendent importance, not only in its present aspects but in what in its future aspects may be implied, I insist, sir, that we shall be permitted to be heard—heard legitimately only, but heard upon this floor in the fashion that the Senate hears an important matter, and that we shall not be put to the physical test that has been advertised in every paper in this land.

That is all that I ask for. I do not care a rap whether I am the one man who is here against this measure or not. I want to present—not here, perhaps, except, of course, I love to talk to my fellows—but I want to present to the men out in the Middle West who are losing their homes; I want to present to the men who are tramping the streets with wasted bodies, begging for bread; I want to present to those people in this country who already are tax-ridden and tax-burdened—I want to present the facts that here in the United States Senate we are going to put upon them $250,000,000 more, owed to us by countries admittedly able to pay the amount of $250,000,000; and then, sir, having presented as best I can to the people of this Nation what this thing means, let them determine ultimately.

Oh, you who sit here in Washington, I think, have little conception of what is going on in this land to-day. We here, surrounded as we are with these tasks which are almost beyond our limitations to perform, have little idea of what is permeating the great body of the American people now, seeping down in this depression, brought home to them by the very fact that they have been deprived of almost all they have; in want; asking only the opportunity to go forward in any legitimate enterprise, and to live in a fashion commensurate with that in which Americans should live. All over this land are these people of ours crying to us for aid, and we, forsooth, will sit all night long for the nations of Europe! We, forsooth, at the first hearing of a moratorium, will sit in continuous session for the purpose of putting upon the backs of these people of ours $250,000,000 owed to us by foreign nations.

This I want to prevent if I can. I recognize the difficulties in the way of the presentation of the reasons against this action, but we have the right to the presentation of them in orderly fashion; to go on by the clock, if this matter shall come before us, until the usual time of adjournment; then to go ahead to-morrow in the usual fashion, permitting every man who desires to be heard to present his views to the Nation and to the Senate, and when those views have been presented, then vote upon the particular matter.

This thing resolves itself into a desire to do one particular thing. Sit here every day, I repeat, if you wish; I do not care how long. I object, however, to the threat which has been uttered all over the land, that we have to sit here in continuous session on this one proposition of taxing to the tune of $250,000,000 the American people because Europe will not pay her just debts.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the adjournment resolution has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and I am prepared to call the committee together at any time to consider that resolution, when it is deemed advisable to do so. In conferring with some of the leaders on the floor, they have expressed the hope that the resolution would not be acted upon for a while, or until it is more definitely determined what business is to be acted upon.

I entertain the same attitude in regard to adjournment as that held by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. If the Senate adjourns, the committees will adjourn. The membership of the committees will be going home, so that the committees will not be here to prepare the legislation we want to pass until we come back after the close of the holidays.

Of course, I do not know what the Committee on Appropriations may report to the Senate; but personally I am opposed to a resolution providing for an adjournment beyond Monday of next week.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, as is well known, agreements regarding adjournments over the holidays are always made by the House and the Senate. Following the usual custom, I entered into that kind of an agreement with the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who at that time stated that it was desired in the House that Congress adjourn from the 22d of December to the 4th of January. Later on, in a subsequent conversation with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the minority leader in the Senate, and Speaker GARNER, the arrangement was renewed.

Subsequently, I made the statement that, inasmuch as the House had passed a resolution to adjourn and had sent it to the Senate, and inasmuch as the moratorium joint resolution was here, I thought it essential that if humanly possible we should pass that joint resolution before we adjourned. That was the sum and substance of my threat.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it intended by the Senator from Indiana, as the leader of the majority, to hold the Senate in session all night for the purpose of passing this joint resolution putting $250,000,000 of debts upon the backs of the American taxpayers?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am not going to argue the moratorium now.

Mr. McKELLAR. What I want to know is whether it is the Senator's proposal that the Senate shall remain in continuous session until this joint resolution is passed?

Mr. WATSON. I can not answer that. I have no power to hold the Senate here if Senators want to go home, but I do think that we should stay here and determine whether or not we can pass the moratorium resolution to-day or to-morrow, because the resolution is here. It is not a new question, as my good friend from California states. It is a question which has been argued over and over again, and the public are thoroughly familiar with it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I deny that statement. The public is not familiar with it. The message of the President of the United States did not state all the facts. The men who signed their telegrams on the 20th day of last June signed them upon a state of facts which was not consummated by the moratorium at all.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I disagree entirely with the Senator from California, and I think I shall be able to show that I am right, if we get into the debate. But it is not necessary that he and I should air our personal differences here about this question.

This matter has been in the public mind for months. The Members of the House of Representatives are not a lot of dull people. They went into this thing thoroughly. They had it before their committee for days and days. They voted on it, and it was carried by an overwhelming majority. Are we to assume they did not know what they were doing when they did that? I am assuming that they were thoroughly familiar with the whole subject, and that when they sent the joint resolution to the Senate they sent it here with full knowledge as to what the situation was, and all of its implications and involvements. At all events, it is here before us. It is here for our consideration. Sixty-eight Senators have agreed to support the proposition, and I am assuming that when they agreed to support it, they had some knowledge of what it was.

Mr. JOHNSON. When was the roll of the 68 Senators called?

Mr. WATSON. The roll was called when the President of the United States sent out the telegrams to those Senators, and got their favorable responses. That is when the roll was called.

Let me say to my good friend from California this about staying here all night. I recall vividly that under his leadership I stayed here several nights and several days in order to put through a proposition in which he was interested. In order to help afford him a quorum we stayed here through the long hours day after day, and I was entirely willing to help him, because I thought his was a just and meritorious cause. But, important as it was, it pales into insignificance compared with the proportions of the great question which confronts and perplexes us to-day.

My views on international questions usually are so nearly in accord with those of the Senator from California that I am loath to find myself in opposition to him on this matter. It has not a thing in the world to do with debt cancellation, with debt reduction, with debt postponement, with future moratoriums, or with any other question relating to our international relations. It is a plain, open proposition, one with which I assume the country is familiar, one which I insist the House knew about when it voted for the joint resolution and sent it here.

If we can in orderly fashion stay here to test whether or not we can pass the joint resolution to-night or to-morrow, I am in favor of doing it. If we can not, we must govern ourselves accordingly, and adjourn, as the situation shall force us to adjourn. But we will have to call the Members of the House back here if we do. The Senator understands just as well as I do exactly what a task that would be.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me extraordinary that we are to be held here by reason of the fact that we assume that Senators and Members of the House both will not do their duty.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am not going to debate with my friend about that. He has been here a long time, and in the two Houses I have been here a longer time. I know how it is when adjournment time comes, when we get ready to go home to the wife and the babies and other folks back home, and the holiday season comes on. I am perfectly familiar with that, and so is the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. We have been at home for nine months, and the wife and babies are tired of us. [Laughter.]

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. DILL. In the light of the fact that the President, who is more anxious about the moratorium than anyone else, did not call Congress together in time, when Congress could have acted on it as it should have been acted on, before the date set for the payments, why should we get so excited that we should sit up all night in order to get the measure through a day or two earlier?

Mr. WATSON. I do not think anybody has to be excited to sit up all night.

Mr. DILL. At least it would look as if we were excited.

Mr. WATSON. The point is that that is behind us. Whether the President acted wisely or unwisely does not enter into this question. We are right now confronted with a situation. It is a condition which confronts us, as Cleveland said on another occasion, and not a theory, and the question now is whether or not we intend to try to pass this moratorium in orderly fashion and in a decent way, or whether we are going to refuse to adjourn and compel the Members of the House to come back after they have gone to their respective homes.

I insist that we shall stay here long enough to-night to find out what there is to this debate, and how much of it there is going to be. If Senators want to talk, nobody has any desire to cut them off from all the debate they want to indulge in. I would not for the world miss hearing my genial and eloquent friend from California on this or any other question, as long as he may desire to address the Senate. The same is true of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], whom I see facing me here. Evidently there was some trepidation lest he be cut off in his desire to debate the proposition. There is no desire on my part, or on the part of any other man who knows anything about this question, to throttle debate or to shut off conversation on the subject.

That is all I care to say about it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that a man may be opposed to a long recess, such as has been proposed, and likewise be opposed to trying to pass this moratorium joint resolution before adjournment without being inconsistent. I have not in my mind coupled them together. I have always been opposed to the long holiday recesses we have taken, and I am opposed to the one proposed now. But I am confronted with what seems to me to be almost a threat that we are to stay in continuous session until the moratorium joint resolution shall be passed. I do not believe that would be orderly procedure. I do not believe the case merits an attempt to rush the joint resolution through by the methods which are evidently going to be adopted.

Personally, I do not believe we ought to take the recess which is provided for in the resolution which passed the House, although it may be that even if we do not we will find ourselves without a quorum and unable to do business. But some time or other we must take the step of not agreeing to these long adjournments for the holiday recess. I am in favor of taking that step at this time. But I do not want it understood that I favor taking up the moratorium and holding the Senate in continuous session until it is disposed of.

The Senator from Indiana knows that the importance of the question is sufficient to warrant giving it the ordinary and usual procedure followed by the Senate in the consideration of questions which are so important. I think it is unnecessary and would be an outrage for us to be compelled to stay in continuous session night and day to dispose of the moratorium. I do not care to debate it at length. If it could be disposed of in a day, I would have no objection, but, on the other hand, it seems to me quite evident that if Senators ask for more time for its consideration, more time to investigate it, it is not unreasonable to grant their request. The country and the world will go along just the same. The moratorium now is an accomplished fact. This is an ex post facto proposition with which we are dealing. The moratorium has been granted—unconstitutionally and illegally, but granted nevertheless; and whether we put our stamp of approval upon it to-day or to-morrow or six weeks from now is, as I look at it, quite immaterial.

I do not like to be put in the attitude of voting contrary to my convictions on the adjournment proposal, but I fear that I am going to be, because I can tell from the discussion that has gone on that it is the intention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and those who are behind the resolution to keep the Senate in continuous session night and day until we dispose of it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I disclaim to my good friend any such intention.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very glad to have that disclaimer.

Mr. WATSON. I think we ought to stay here until along in the night sometime and find out what the situation is. I do not mean all night.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; say just along about 4 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. WATSON. It might be that 3.30 a. m. would be sufficient. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes!

Mr. WATSON. But seriously now——

Mr. NORRIS. Should we not adjourn about 5 o'clock this afternoon, as we have been doing from day to day?

Mr. WATSON. I do not think so.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator fix a time in his estimate of orderly procedure?

Mr. WATSON. I want to find out about the usual course of debate. Let us find out how the debate proceeds and be governed by circumstances.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is going to run along probably until nearly morning before he determines that question.

Mr. WATSON. We shall all be here.

Mr. NORRIS. I say to the Senator in all good faith, and to his colleagues here who by following him have demonstrated, on the election of a President pro tempore at least, that they follow him blindly, follow him to the limit, that he dictates what they shall do to such an extent that he has on this great, big, broad shoulders a terrible responsibility. In the matter now before us why will not the Senator say to us at this time how long he expects to remain in session to-night?

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator from Nebraska follows me as faithfully in this matter as he has in voting for a President pro tempore, it seems to me we are going to adjourn pretty early this afternoon.

Mr. NORRIS. If I were to follow the Senator so faithfully in that matter as others seem to be willing and glad to follow him, I probably would change a course of action which I have followed in my career, and that the Senator does not expect.

Mr. WATSON. No; the Senator is entirely right about it. I do not expect it.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator tell us how long, in his judgment, we are going to remain here to-night?

Mr. WATSON. I have not the slightest idea in the world, but I think I can sit down with the Senator from Nebraska when the time comes and agree upon a time to adjourn.

Mr. NORRIS. I think probably there would not be much difficulty about that.

Mr. WATSON. We nearly always agree. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. But I do not want to have to vote on the adjournment proposition with what I believe to be a threat hanging over my head in the interest of some legislation to which I am opposed.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator knows that in the course of senatorial debate time and time without number Senators in charge of measures have risen on the floor of the Senate and said, "I intend to ask that the Senate shall remain in session to-night until we conclude this proposition."

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly. I have done it myself.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; the Senator has done it himself.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator referred to the case of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], where he stayed here all night with the Senator from California and the rest of us, but he does not tell Senators that that was after days and days and days had been spent in debating the particular question then before us. It was not a new matter coming out of a clear sky like this moratorium question.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator say this is a new matter?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it is a new matter.

Mr. WATSON. He and I sharply disagree about that.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator goes on the theory that Senators here have pledged themselves to vote for this measure. That is another disagreeable thing to me, to have the Senator say, as the representatives of the President have said publicly and before committees of Congress, "We have your signatures, 68 of you. Now come across. Come over, you fellows. We will expose you if you do not." That is the only inference that can be drawn from the situation. "We have you signed up. We have you on the list, and we are sure you will not be missing."

That is the kind of doctrine the Senator now presents and says, "Why, the President has the signatures of 68 of us, so what is the use of debating it?" That may be right, but if it is right then we ought to change the Constitution of the United States. If that is right, then we do not have a democracy in America any longer. If it is right, we ought to have a Mussolini on the throne, because he could issue his decrees and everybody would have to obey. This is a little different route that is taken this time; but if sending out, as the Senator said, and polling the Members of Congress by the President is the way to legislate, then our forefathers made a mistake when they thought they had provided for a legislative branch and an executive branch of the Government that should be independent of each other.

Mr. President, when that kind of an attempt is made to control Congress I am not in favor of permitting it to be done without a protest. I believe that it is wrong; I believe that it is illegal. I am not in favor of just saying, "Now, we will take our medicine. We will go without food or drink and stay here night and day until we are called to the time when we shall vote." I am not in favor of that kind of method of legislating.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I quite agree with the Senator that we ought to take the time to allow all who wish to discuss the subject to do so. Are we quite right in assuming that it is going to take a longer time than we will have in the orderly ordinary hours of sessions of the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps not.

Mr. FLETCHER. Has the Senator any idea about the length of time that would be required?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know about that. I thank the Senator for calling me back to the orderly procedure, because the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] has referred to it. We all know what orderly procedure is. When a bill or a measure comes before the Senate, we start out to debate it, as the Senator from Indiana said, to see how the debate is going to continue and whether any coercive measures may ultimately be necessary to bring it to a vote. I have never yet known in a matter of this importance where anyone suggested while we were doing that that we should work here a way into the night to find out about that matter. We do not do that way. We never have done that way. But when we go on in orderly procedure and adjourn at the usual hour for a day or two or three and it becomes evident that somebody wants to filibuster or kill time, then is sufficient time to talk about staying all night and adopting urgent measures to reach a conclusion. But we have not yet reached that stage in connection with this matter. The joint resolution has not even been read yet. It is really not before us yet.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The ordinary procedure, as every one of us knows, is that the leaders make inquiries on both sides as to who are going to speak on an important matter of this kind, and then they make their estimates of the time when a vote shall be had after considering the number of speeches that are to be made, the length of them, and matters of that sort. To my mind this is one of the most important questions that has ever come before the American people, and yet before the debate actually starts it is announced in the newspapers that we are going to be required to remain in continuous session until the measure is disposed of.

Mr. NORRIS. And we pretty nearly get that idea when we hear the leader on this side of the aisle speak. He says it may not be all right. No; probably we will wear everybody out before that time comes, so it will not be necessary to remain here all night.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield the floor.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the Senator from Nebraska will incorporate his position in motions, both with respect to a short adjournment and reasonable opportunity for debate, there will be at least some support on this side of the Chamber of the views of the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it seems to me we are consuming time with very little profit in discussing the question of adjournment at this time. I wish respectfully to suggest to the leader on the other side and those who are particularly interested in the pending resolution in relation to a moratorium that there does not seem to be any reason for undue haste about the matter or that the question of holiday adjournment should hang upon the question of whether the resolution is passed before the Christmas recess or thereafter.

The time within which the payments were to have been made is now past and gone. The executive department has given assurances which were accepted as satisfactory and the payments have not been made. What is the difference whether the approbation of the Congress with respect to that matter comes before the Christmas holidays or after the Christmas holidays.

I do not always pay very much attention to what is said to be the purposes of the leader upon the other side of the Chamber. I do not care to pry into what his purposes are with respect to keeping this body in session all night. When the hour of 5 or 5.30 p. m. is reached, some one can make a motion to adjourn and then the vote of the Senate will be taken upon that motion and we will adjourn or remain in session all night as the majority of the Senate determines. For my part I can see no reason whatever why we should remain in session all night or any considerable part of the night on this particular legislation, which, as I said, might just as well go over until after the Christmas holidays as to be disposed of now.

Mr. President, something was said with respect to the question of whether the motion to adjourn for the Christmas holidays is debatable or not. I, of course, recognize the principle asserted by the Presiding Officer that a motion to adjourn is not debatable, but this is not an ordinary motion to adjourn. This is a motion to adjourn to a time certain. Obviously, it seems to me, there would be no question that it is subject to amendment, and if it is subject to amendment to change the date from January 4 to December 28 it would certainly be open to debate as to whether that is an advisable change to make or not. The point I make is that we ought to dispose of the question to adjourn for the holidays when that matter comes before us. It has not yet had the consideration even of the Committee on Appropriations.

While I am on my feet I want to advert to a reason possibly intimated by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] why we ought not to disagree to the House resolution to adjourn. The House has passed a resolution to adjourn until the 4th of January. It is understood that the leaders in the Senate, the leader on the Republican side and the leader on the Democratic side, have at least tentatively assented to that proposition. I myself am not a little apprehensive as to what the effect on the country would be just now if it was considered that possibly the situation throughout the land is of such a critical character at this time as to require the Senate to remain in continuous session during the holidays and not take the usual holiday recess. I am afraid that much more harm would result from a disagreement to the House resolution than benefit could possibly accrue by disagreeing to it. At least I think that consideration ought to have the careful attention of Senators in voting upon the motion to fix the date when we shall reconvene after the holiday recess.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, with much that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] have said I am in accord. The moratorium, whether of benefit or otherwise for the world, is an accomplished fact. Whether we vote upon it to-day or three weeks from to-day is of little consequence so far as the moratorium is concerned, but there is a factor in connection with this subject to which we should give serious consideration, for we can not disassociate the need of action upon this question from other questions that are pending before Congress.

In my judgment, we should dispose of this matter speedily in order that we may give our undivided and immediate attention to every possible measure that has been or will be proposed to relieve present economic conditions in this country. Up to this time, if there is blame or responsibility for present depressed economic conditions and the failure to provide adequate remedies for relief, it is not with Congress; it is clearly on the shoulders of another branch of the Government. If the Congress now delays, if we fail to consider promptly all relief proposals, if we fail the people, the burden of responsibility will shift rightly and properly to Congress.

With many banks closing in my State, with $75,000,000 of deposits, on the eve of Christmas, removed temporarily at least from the poor people of Massachusetts, and millions from depositors in other States, I do not propose to delay one hour in giving attention and consideration to any reasonable proposal, whether from President, Senator, or Representative, that will relieve the threatened panicky condition that now overshadows the Nation.

I fear we do not realize fully the awful alarm that prevails among the American people; and, rightly, we shall be held chargeable if we dillydally, postpone, or fail to grapple with every and all proposals seeking to give relief to our shaken financial structure. We must restore confidence to our people, and seek to relieve the misery and suffering and poverty now prevailing throughout the country. Let us not allow the people's faith in their Government to vanish through our indifference or inaction.

Therefore I repeat action upon the moratorium is important to the extent that we get it out of the way, clear the decks of legislation that is not urgent, and turn our minds, our hearts, and our souls to the remedial measures that will seek to bolster up the tottering financial institutions of the country, that may give employment to more of our people, and that will restore hope and confidence in our capacity to serve and help them, and thereby remove the clouds of despair that now hang more heavily than ever before in the history of our country over our Republic.

I hope Senators will act speedily and hastily, taking only the time actually necessary for reasonable debate, and proceed immediately to the consideration of the questions of economic relief to our suffering people here in America.

H. E. HURLEY

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The first bill on the calendar was the bill (S. 258) authorizing adjustment of the claim of H. E. Hurley, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of H. E. Hurley, trading as J. E. Hurley, for damages resulting from the failure of the Government to execute and perform a contract in accordance with his proposal accepted June 27, 1928, for the installation of an ash bin in the State, War, and Navy Building, Washington, D. C., and to allow in full and final settlement of said claim the sum of not to exceed $553.50. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $553.50, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of the claim.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if the bill does not command payment of the entire amount?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], the chairman of the Committee on Claims, is absent. I have sent for him, and I think he will be here in a few moments. I suggest that the bill be passed over for the time being.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be passed over for the moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BLANCH BROOMFIELD

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 551) for the relief of Blanch Broomfield, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Blanch Broomfield, widow of Florus Broomfield, the sum of $5,000, as compensation for the death of such Florus Broomfield on May 5, 1926, while employed as a teacher in the Indian Service at Rosebud Reservation, Rosebud Agency, S. Dak.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BENJAMIN BRAZNELL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 468) for the relief of the estate of Benjamin Braznell, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen and allow the claim of the Braddock Trust Co., executor of the estate of Benjamin Braznell, late of Pittsburgh, Pa., and refund the sum of $2,323.47, the balance of taxes illegally collected, under existing laws and decisions.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THIRTY-FOURTH ANNUAL REPORT, NATIONAL SOCIETY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION (S. DOC. NO. 25)

The resolution (S. Res. 104) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Thirty-fourth Annual Report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution for the year ended April 1, 1931, be printed, with illustrations, as a Senate document.

INVESTIGATION OF RAILROAD PROBLEMS

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 3) establishing a joint congressional committee to make a general investigation and study of railroad problems was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire if that is a resolution submitted by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is.

Mr. KING. And it is desired that the resolution shall be adopted?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; he is very anxious, as I understand, to have the resolution adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments, on page 2, line 10, after the word "represented" to insert, "Provided, however, That the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives shall be authorized to fill any vacancies in said joint congressional committee by appointing some other member or members of their respective committees from the same political party as the member whose position is thus filled"; and on page 4, line 7, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$10,000," and insert "$1,000," so as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Whereas many railroads are involved in grave financial difficulties, and all the railroads have sought a 15 per cent increase in freight rates; and

Whereas there is a movement now in progress to reduce the wages of all railway employees although it appears that approximately 500,000 normally necessary railway employees are now unemployed, and many thousands of others have only part-time employment, and that the present earnings of a large percentage of the employed railway workers are less than the amount necessary for a decent livelihood; and

Whereas responsible representatives of the railroads have indicated that financial assistance of the Federal Government will be sought in order to maintain the operations of many railroads, and to avoid further impairment of transportation service and further deferment of necessary maintenance with the resulting increase of unemployment; and

Whereas an emergency exists requiring that a coordinated program be developed immediately to preserve continuous and efficient railroad transportation and to avoid the imposition of intolerable burdens upon either the necessary investment or the necessary labor required to maintain this essential public service; and

Whereas there is no single agency of the Government authorized to develop such a program, or charged with full responsibility for determining the extent to which Government aid can and should be extended to meet all the needs of the present emergency: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there is hereby established a joint congressional committee to be composed of the chairman, the ranking majority member, the ranking minority member, and the next ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate, and the chairman, the ranking majority member, the ranking minority member, and the next ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives: Provided, however, That the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives shall be authorized to fill any vacancies in said joint congressional committee by appointing some other member or members of their respective committees from the same political party as the member whose position is thus filled. The committee is authorized and directed to make a general investigation and study of all matters affecting the operations of common carriers by railroad subject to the interstate commerce act, with a particular view to determining to what extent the Federal Government can aid during the present emergency in preserving continuous and efficient transportation service by railroad, in alleviating the financial difficulties in which many such carriers are involved, in relieving the distress of the unemployed railroad workers, and in preventing further unemployment among such workers. The committee shall report to the Congress from time to time during the first session of the Seventy-second Congress the results of such investigation and study, together with its recommendations for necessary remedial legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit, and act at such times and places during the first session of the Seventy-second Congress, to employ such experts, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $1,000, shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. TYDINGS subsequently said: Mr. President, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is absent to-day. His office asked if I would not object in his name to the consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 3, establishing a joint congressional committee to make a general investigation and study of railroad problems, if it should be reached. Unfortunately, while Senators were at lunch, without a quorum being called, the matter was taken up and the concurrent resolution was agreed to. I personally have no particular objection to it at this time, but inasmuch as the Senator from New York is absent, and asked me to make objection, I ask that the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to be reconsidered. I understand the Senator from New York will be here to-morrow morning.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to is reconsidered, and the concurrent resolution will go back to the calendar.

DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIEN SEAMEN

The bill (S. 7) to provide for the deportation of certain alien seamen, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, this is a bill which has been before the Senate at various sessions. Some years ago some hearings were held on it, but no hearings were held on during the last Congress or at this session. As Senators will remember, at the last session I was very much opposed to this bill, believing that it was not in the interest of the merchant marine. Mr. President, I am going to ask the chairman of the committee if he will not be willing to have the bill rereferred either to his committee or to the Committee on Commerce in order that hearings may be held, particularly on the part of those who believe that its enactment would seriously hamper the merchant marine?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I have no objection to having the bill recommitted to the Committee on Immigration. However, there was no objection made to the bill, and there was a very full attendance of the Committee on Immigration when the bill was considered. There being no objection, and no one requesting to be heard, there was little left for the committee to do other than report the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this bill in one form or another has been before the Senate for a number of years. A similar measure was offered to an important bill in the House a number of years ago as an amendment, but it was held not to be germane to the bill which was then under consideration, and, though there was considerable testimony taken, as I recall, the measure was not taken up in the House. Subsequently this bill was offered in the Senate—I have forgotten the exact time, but I think in the Sixty-seventh or Sixty-eighth Congress—and extensive hearings were had in that Congress and in two succeeding Congresses, testimony both for and some testimony which could be construed to be against the bill. So hearings were had upon three separate occasions. All that could be stated against the bill, I submit respectfully, was offered in those hearings, while not all that could be said in favor of the bill was offered in those hearings.

I would not be willing as a member of the committee, Mr. President, to have the bill recommitted to the Committee on Immigration, and certainly I should object to its reference to the Committee on Commerce. The Committee on Immigration has had jurisdiction of this measure for three or four Congresses. In the House of Representatives the Committee on Immigration has had jurisdiction of the same subject.

I have no objection to giving my friend from Connecticut full opportunity to debate it and to present any facts that he may have and that he may deem relevant and pertinent. I shall not ask to have the bill considered at this time, in view of the desire to take up the moratorium measure; but, as I have stated, I shall be very glad to afford the Senator, so far as I have a voice in the matter, full opportunity to present any facts to the Senate and to discuss the bill to his heart's content.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I submit to my friend from Utah, who is always fair-minded in such matters, that it is a little bit unusual to have the bill reported without any opportunity for hearings being given at this time. There were no hearings held during the last Congress. Those who are most immediately concerned in what they believe will be a very serious damage done to their business are anxious to present facts, many of them new facts, before the committee. They understood that there would be no action on this bill before the Christmas holidays, and they supposed that an opportunity would be given for a hearing. They have asked that a hearing be given by the committee; and in all fairness, Mr. President, it seems to me that no harm can come to the Senator's bill by having the bill rereferred to the committee, with an opportunity for those most immediately concerned to be heard. If what the Senator says and what I believe to be true is so, that the committee is largely of the opinion that it is a good bill, the bill can then be reported back to the Senate after hearings. However, it does seem to me, Mr. President, that it is not in accordance with good legislative procedure to rush the bill which has been fought for years out of the committee without any opportunity for a hearing, and when the first request comes for a hearing to have it denied and merely be told, instead of being able to present witnesses before the committee and get their opinion in a public record which can be used, that, forsooth, I may have an opportunity to debate the measure at length on the floor of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is very greatly interested in this bill. He asked me to request that it go over for to-day, and I hope that course will be taken because of the request of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

S. F. STACHER

The bill (S. 243) for the relief of S. F. Stacher was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the General Accounting Office is hereby authorized and directed to credit the accounts of S. F. Stacher, superintendent and special disbursing agent, Eastern Navajo Indian Agency, Crown Point, N. Mex., in the sum of $3,004.17, representing an expenditure of that sum in the appropriation for Indian school buildings, over and above the $37,000 authorized for construction and equipment of a heating and power plant at Eastern Navajo School, fiscal year 1929.

P. Caperton, who was killed August 24, 1918, at Nitro, W. Va., when a freight train backed into the ambulance he was driving while in the performance of his duties.

DONALD K. WARNER

The bill (S. 241) for the relief of Donald K. Warner was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, to Donald K. Warner, postmaster at Oakdale, Nebr., the sum of $869.17, being the amount of stamps and postal funds lost in the burglary of the post office on the night of December 13, 1928.

R. B. MILLER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 159) for the relief of R. B. Miller, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$9,407.54, said amount representing the principal sum of $6,336.38 overpayments in freight on" and to insert "$2,500, in full and final settlement of all claims or demands of whatsoever nature, kind, or character against the Government, on account of the shipment of," and on page 2, line 5, after the word "law," to strike out "and the interest on said sum from the respective dates of shipment to April 1, 1926"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to R. B. Miller, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500, in full and final settlement of all claims or demands of whatsoever nature, kind, or character against the Government, on account of the shipment of 75 carloads of manganese ore shipped over the Norfolk & Western Railroad from Suter, Va., Rocky Gap, Va., and Graham, Va., to Reading, Pa., Harrisburg, Pa., and Birmingham, Ala., during the period that said railroad was operated by the Director General of Railroads, and which said amount was in excess of the regular freight rates published and allowed by law.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over, unless there is an explanation of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

C. M. WILLIAMSON AND OTHERS

The bill (S. 458) for the relief of C. M. Williamson, Mrs. C. E. Liljenquist, administratrix, Lottie Redman, and H. N. Smith was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MILBURN KNAPP

The bill (S. 971) for the relief of Milburn Knapp was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING and Mr. WHEELER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ELIZABETH B. EDDY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1214) to carry into effect the finding of the Court of Claims in the claim of Elizabeth B. Eddy, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, after the word "act," to insert:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 20 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 20 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the legal representative of the estate of Elizabeth B. Eddy, widow of Charles G. Eddy, of New York, N. Y., the sum of $602.92, and the said sum is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of this act: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 20 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 20 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COMMISSION, GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1306) to provide for the incorporation of the District of Columbia Commission, George Washington Bicentennial, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, on page 2, line 10, after the word "prescribed," to insert "subject to the supervision of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia or subject to the supervision of the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks, as the case may be," so as to make the bill read:

SEC. 3. That Congress hereby reserves to itself the right to alter, amend, and repeal this act or any provisions thereof.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator in charge of the bill explain to the Senate the purpose of the bill?

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the bill proposes to give the District commission in charge of the bicentennial celebration authority to erect a stand which will provide seats.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Why does the commission have to be incorporated?

Mr. CAPPER. That was the opinion of the corporation counsel. The corporation counsel came to the meeting of the committee and supported the legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The committees of the several States have not been incorporated.

Mr. CAPPER. This, of course, applies only to the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The reason for the proposed legislation is because the legal department of the District requested it?

Mr. CAPPER. That is the situation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF DISTRICT COMMISSIONERS OF MINISTERIAL DUTIES

The bill (S. 2077) to relieve the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of certain ministerial duties was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the secretary of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or in his absence or upon his inability to act, such person as said commissioners may designate, when so directed by said commissioners, to execute in the name of the District of Columbia or of said board by attaching thereto his signature as such secretary and affixing, when requisite, the seal of said District, any deed, contract, pleading, lease, release, regulation, notice, or other paper, which heretofore said commissioners were required to execute by subscribing thereto their respective signatures: Provided, That prior to such signing, and sealing if requisite, said deed, contract, pleading, lease, release, regulation, notice, or other paper shall first have been considered and approved by said board of commissioners, or a majority of them, sitting as a board, and evidence of such consideration and approval shall be reduced to writing and recorded in the minutes of said board of commissioners, which minutes shall thereafter be signed by the members of said board of commissioners, or a majority thereof.

H. E. HURLEY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, we have not completed the calendar. When the first bill came up a question was asked, and I requested that it go over until the return to the Chamber of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], who is here at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The bill (S. 258) authorizing adjustment of the claim of H. E. Hurley was considered by the Senate and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of H. E. Hurley, trading as J. E. Hurley, for damages resulting from the failure of the Government to execute and perform a contract in accordance with his proposal accepted June 27, 1928, for the installation of an ash bin in the State, War, and Navy Building, Washington, D. C., and to allow in full and final settlement of said claim the sum of not to exceed $553.50. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $553.50, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of the claim.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, a contract was entered into for the construction of an ash bin for the War and Navy Departments right over a bin that had already been constructed. Certain work has been done. Then it was decided to substitute oil for coal, and the work was discontinued. A claim was put in by the contractor for the expenditures he had made; and, after audit by the Comptroller General, the Comptroller General recommended that the claim be allowed for the amount stated here. As a consequence, the Committee on Claims recommended the passage of this bill at the last session, and it was passed by the Senate, and I think was favorably recommended by the House committee.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator whether the department for which the work was done recommends the passage of this measure?

Mr. HOWELL. I do not know that the department did.

I do know, however, that a contract was entered into for the work, that the work was not completed, and that a claim was made and went to the Comptroller General, who investigated the matter and recommended the passage of a bill for the relief of Hurley. I do not recall, however, whether or not the department made any recommendation in reference thereto.

Mr. KING. Did the Senator's committee make any investigation as to the validity of the claim and its righteousness?

Mr. HOWELL. We made no investigation except that we accepted the report of the Comptroller General.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator recall the date of the contract and the breach of it, if there was a breach, by the Government?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; the work was begun——

Mr. KING. In what year?

Mr. HOWELL. In 1928—May 24, 1928.

Mr. KING. I withdraw any objection.

Mr. HOWELL. The contract was let and the work was begun.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah withdraws his objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the calendar.

FOREIGN-DEBT MORATORIUM

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 147, to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. If the motion of the Senator from Utah shall be agreed to, it now being but 10 minutes to 2 o'clock, will the joint resolution be laid aside at 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be laid before the Senate at 2 o'clock.

The motion of the Senator from Utah is not debatable, and the question is on agreeing to his motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in the case of each of the following countries, Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to make, on behalf of the United States, an agreement with the Government of such country to postpone the payment of any amount payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, by such country to the United States in respect of its bonded indebtedness to the United States, except that in the case of Germany the agreement shall relate only to amounts payable by Germany to the United States during such fiscal year in respect of the costs of the army of occupation.

SEC. 2. Each such agreement on behalf of the United States shall provide for the payment of the postponed amounts, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum beginning July 1, 1933, in 10 equal annuities, the first to be paid during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1933, and one during each of the nine fiscal years following, each annuity to be payable in one or more installments.

SEC. 3. No such agreement shall be made with the Government of any country unless it appears to the satisfaction of the President that such Government has made, or has given, satisfactory assurances of willingness and readiness to make, with the Government of each of the other countries indebted to such country in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts, an agreement in respect of such debt substantially similar to the agreement authorized by this joint resolution to be made with the Government of such creditor country on behalf of the United States.

SEC. 4. Each agreement authorized by this joint resolution shall be made so that payments of annuities under such agreement shall, unless otherwise provided in the agreement (1) be in accordance with the provisions contained in the agreement made with the government of such country under which the payment to be postponed is payable, and (2) be subject to the same terms and conditions as payments under such original agreement.

SEC. 5. It is hereby expressly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced; and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy, or as implying that favorable consideration will be given at any time to a change in the policy hereby declared.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I take it for granted that every Senator knows exactly what this joint resolution provides. It has been discussed in the press for months past. It passed the House of Representatives by a great majority, I think three-fourths of the Members of the House having voted for it, as a matter of fact.

Hearings were held by the Ways and Means Committee of the House before the joint resolution was passed in the House, and a hearing was held by the Finance Committee after it reached the Senate. I can not do better than to call attention to the report of the House committee, which I adopted as a report of the Finance Committee, to the Senate upon the joint resolution.

The subject has been before the country for months; and I have no doubt but that every Senator has read the report of the House Committee on Ways and Means, which I ask now to have incorporated as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 17, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

FOREIGN-DEBT MORATORIUM

Mr SMOOT, from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following report (to accompany H. J. Res. 147):

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the Senate without amendment and recommend that the resolution do pass.

Following is a copy of the House report, which is appended hereto and made a part of this report.

[House Report No. 9, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House without amendment and recommend that the resolution do pass.

Your committee was very desirous of obtaining all information available as to the economic situation in Germany and Europe and the necessity for the moratorium. With that end in view, it was announced that public hearings would be had. The chairman, through the press and otherwise, invited any interested parties to appear and testify before the committee. The Treasury Department was represented at the hearing by Hon. Ogden L. Mills, the Under Secretary of the Treasury, and the State Department in the person of the Secretary of State, Hon. Henry L. Stimson. Both these witnesses made full statements as to the economic conditions in Europe, and they were interrogated by the committee.

The London protocol, the agreement entered into by the interested nations agreeing to the terms of the moratorium, was before the committee and is a part of the record, as is the agreement between France and the United States, known as the Franco-American agreement. Three of the Members of the House of Representatives appeared before the committee. From time to time it was suggested to the committee that either the Treasury Department or the State Department had information that was very material to the issues involved in this bill and that such information had been withheld from the committee. Your committee, without exception, took the necessary steps to obtain such information if it existed. With this end in view, the Under Secretary of the Treasury was several times invited again before the committee and interrogated about these matters and the same was true as to the Secretary of State. In each instance the committee found nothing to substantiate these statements.

Some of the witnesses appearing before the committee opposing the bill laid particular stress on a newspaper article to the effect that some of the nations indebted to the United States had deposited the necessary funds with their fiscal agents in the United States to pay the amounts due on December 15. Your committee diligently sought to ascertain whether or not this was true. The correspondent who wrote the article was invited to appear before the committee, which he cheerfully did, but claimed his privilege and did not advise the committee from whom he obtained the information, the basis of the article above referred to. Your committee then ascertained from the Treasury Department that it understood that J. P. Morgan & Co. was the fiscal agent of some of the countries involved. Therefore the committee requested a representative from that firm to appear before the committee. Mr. Henry P. Davison, of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., appeared and advised the committee that his firm represented as fiscal agents in the United States Great Britain and France. Mr. Davison positively stated to the committee that these Governments had not deposited any funds to pay their installments due the United States on December 15, nor had they communicated with them on the subject. The Under Secretary of the Treasury stated that the payments made to the United States by these three countries in 1929 and 1930 were made for Great Britain and France by Morgan & Co. through the Federal reserve bank in New York.

With greatest respect, your committee is of the opinion that this is an extraneous matter and has no bearing on the case whatever.

On the last day of the hearing, in the forenoon, after hearing two witnesses, no one else appeared. The chairman then stated that he had given ample notice through the press and through the members of the hearings and that opportunity would be given to anyone to appear. After stating this, the chairman then announced to the public that he would be glad to hear anyone present. Having no response, the committee went into executive session.

It seems highly significant to your committee that, despite the widespread publicity of this matter since the President's announcement of June 20, 1931, no individual or representative of any group appeared or sought an opportunity to be heard in opposition to the resolution with the exception of the three Members of the House above referred to, who were given a full hearing.

Objections have been made to the word "reparations" as it appears in the resolutions on the ground that it links the United States to the whole reparations question. This term is merely intended as a description of one of the class of debts which must be postponed by the recipient countries in order for such countries as are indebted to the United States to participate under the President's proposal of June 20. This resolution in no way whatever links the United States with the payment of German reparations to the Allies, nor does it in any way make the payment due the United States by the Allies dependent upon receiving reparations from Germany. In fact, if the terms of the resolution were changed in this respect, the United States would be put in the position of postponing a debt due it from a country without such country being obligated to postpone what in many cases is the most important item of the amounts due such foreign countries, namely, the reparation payments. The committee is firmly of the opinion that nothing in the resolution can in any manner be construed as indicating a policy of debt cancellation or reduction, or as committing the United States or Congress to such a policy. In view, however, of repeated statements by opponents of the resolution the committee feels it desirable to set the matter at rest by the insertion of section 5.

The testimony given before the committee indicated that adverse economic developments in Europe had, by the beginning of 1931, placed the national economies of certain countries, particularly of central Europe, under severe strain. By June it was evident that events were rapidly shaping toward major crises the repercussions of which would seriously affect economic conditions throughout the world and which could not but react adversely upon conditions in this country.

It had become apparent early in the year that economic conditions in Germany were deteriorating at a fairly rapid pace. In Austria the disclosure of the unsound condition of the country's largest credit institution precipitated a crisis in that country in the latter part of May which necessitated the extending of ouside financial assistance and became so serious as to accentuate increasing apprehension regarding the economic and budgetary situation of Germany.

It became evident by the 1st of June that a slow run had begun upon German banks, in fact, upon the central institution, the Reichsbank. Subsequently this run assumed major proportions. Between the end of May and June 20, the outflow of funds from Germany resulted in a reduction of 1,000,000,000 Reichsmarks, or approximately $250,000,000, in the Reichsbank holdings of gold and foreign exchange. This represented approximately two-fifths of the bank's total reserves. On Friday, June 19, and Saturday, June 20, the withdrawals were so heavy that the reserves of the Reichsbank reached the legal minimum and it was obvious that unless some action was taken at once to change public sentiment and check the withdrawal of funds from Germany the Reichsbank would be obliged to suspend its reserve requirements and in all probability go off the gold basis with consequences most serious not only in Germany but throughout the world.

To meet the impending crisis and to avoid the inevitable adverse effects of the impending catastrophe upon conditions in the United States as well as in Europe, the President proposed, subject to confirmation by Congress, the postponement during one year from July 1, 1931, to June 30, 1932, of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, both principal and interest. This proposal was made in the belief, which subsequent events seem to justify, that timely action should contribute to relieve the pressure of adverse forces operating in foreign countries and should assist in the reestablishment of confidence. The announcement of the proposal on June 20 resulted in the immediate termination of withdrawals of funds from Germany and increased prices of commodities and securities in world markets. Although these benefits were not entirely retained, the impending catastrophe was averted.

The resolution under consideration authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to conclude agreements with our debtor governments which have accepted the President's proposal of June 20, 1931, and have made or have given satisfactory assurances of their willingness and readiness to make with each of their debtor governments an agreement on substantially similar terms as the agreements proposed to be made with our debtors.

Section 2 of the resolution authorizes the amounts postponed to be repaid over a period of 10 years beginning July 1, 1933, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum. In July, 1931, the principal creditor governments met in London for the purpose of putting into effect the President's proposal, at which conference it was agreed that the amounts postponed should be repaid on the same conditions as specified in the resolution except that the interest rate was 3 per cent. In view of the fact that conditions have changed since that meeting in July and that the obligations of the United States Government are now selling on the market at a rate to yield about 4 per cent, it is felt that a 4 per cent rate is justified.

The agreements to be made under this resolution should, so far as possible, be subject to the same terms and conditions as the payments to be made under the original debt-funding agreements, except that there is to be no right of further postponement in respect of the payments in question, and except that payments should be made in cash. There may be a possible exception to the right of postponement in the case of Austria. It will be recalled that Austria has relief debts owing to nine different creditor governments. The conditions under which this indebtedness was created make it necessary that the postponed payments be subject to uniform terms and conditions of repayment for all creditors. Under the agreements now existing the trustees of the League of Nations' reconstruction loan have the right to object in any year to the payments being made during that year. Depending upon the action to be taken by all the creditor governments, it may be necessary to continue this right of postponement. In the case of Greece, part of its indebtedness is serviced through the International Financial Commission and it is advisable, if possible, to continue this arrangement with respect to the postponed payments on account of this indebtedness.

The provisions of section 4 are necessarily broad in order to cover the cases of Austria and Greece, but the committee has the pledge of the Treasury that exceptions to the terms of existing agreements will be confined to the above-mentioned points.

A copy of the President's statement of June 20, 1931, and a statement showing the amounts due the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932 which are affected by the President's proposal follow:

"The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, both principal and interest, of course, not including obligations of governments held by private parties. Subject to confirmation by Congress, the American Government will postpone all payments upon the debts of foreign governments to the American Government payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1 next, conditional on a like postponement for one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts owing the important creditor powers.

"This course of action has been approved by the following Senators: Henry F. Ashurst, Hiram Bingham, William E. Borah, James F. Byrnes, Arthur Capper, Simeon D. Fess, Duncan U. Fletcher, Carter Glass, William J. Harris, Pat Harrison, Cordell Hull, William H. King, Dwight W. Morrow, George H. Moses, David A. Reed, Claude A. Swanson, Arthur Vandenberg, Robert F. Wagner, David I. Walsh, Thomas J. Walsh, James E. Watson; and by the following Representatives: Isaac Bacharach, Joseph W. Byrns, Carl R. Chindblom, Frank Crowther, James W. Collier, Charles R. Crisp, Thomas H. Cullen, George P. Darrow, Harry A. Estep, Willis C. Hawley, Carl E. Mapes, J. C. McLaughlin, Earl C. Michener, C. William Ramseyer, Bertrand H. Snell, John Q. Tilson, Allen T. Treadway, and Will R. Wood. It has been approved by Ambassador Charles G. Dawes and Mr. Owen D. Young.

"The purpose of this action is to give the forthcoming year to the economic recovery of the world and to help free the recuperative forces already in motion in the United States from retarding influences from abroad.

"The world-wide depression has affected the countries of Europe more severely than our own. Some of these countries are feeling to a serious extent the drain of this depression on national economy. The fabric of intergovernmental debts, supportable in normal times, weighs heavily in the midst of this depression.

"From a variety of causes arising out of the depression, such as the fall in the price of foreign commodities and the lack of confidence in economic and political stability abroad, there is an abnormal movement of gold into the United States, which is lowering the credit stability of many foreign countries. These and the other difficulties abroad diminish buying power for our exports and in a measure are the cause of our continued unemployment and continued lower prices to our farmers.

"Wise and timely action should contribute to relieve the pressure of these adverse forces in foreign countries and should assist in the reestablishment of confidence, thus forwarding political peace and economic stability in the world.

"Authority of the President to deal with this problem is limited, as this action must be supported by the Congress. It has been assured the cordial support of leading members of both parties in the Senate and the House. The essence of this proposition is to give time to permit debtor governments to recover their national prosperity. I am suggesting to the American people that they be wise creditors in their own interest and be good neighbors.

"I wish to take this occasion also to frankly state my views upon our relations to German reparations and the debts owed to us by the allied governments of Europe. Our Government has not been a party to or exerted any voice in determination of reparation obligations. We purposely did not participate in either general reparations or the division of colonies or property. The repayment of debts due to us from the Allies for the advance for war and reconstruction were settled upon a basis not contingent upon German reparations or related thereto. Therefore reparations is necessarily wholly a European problem with which we have no relation.

"I do not approve in any remote sense of the cancellation of the debts to us. World confidence would not be enhanced by such action. None of our debtor nations has ever suggested it. But as the basis of the settlement of these debts was the capacity under normal conditions of the debtor to pay, we should be consistent with our own policies and principles if we take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world. I am sure the American people have no desire to attempt to extract any sum beyond the capacity of any debtor to pay, and it is our view that broad vision requires that our Government should recognize the situation as it exists.

"This course of action is entirely consistent with the policy which we have hitherto pursued. We are not involved in the discussion of strictly European problems, of which the payment of German reparations is one. It represents our willingness to make a contribution to the early restoration of world prosperity, in which our own people have so deep an interest.

"I wish further to add that while this action has no bearing on the conference for limitation of land armaments to be held next February, inasmuch as the burden of competitive armaments has contributed to bring about this depression, we trust that by this evidence of our desire to assist we shall have contributed to the good will which is so necessary in the solution of this major question.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY

We, a minority of the Ways and Means Committee, to whom was referred House Joint Resolution No. 147, "To authorize the postponement of the amounts to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933," respectfully dissent from the views of the majority for the following reasons, to wit:

CONSTITUTION IGNORED

The President of the United States did not have the constitutional right to take the action which he did in June of this year with respect to the moratorium. Under the Constitution of the United States, this was a matter to be determined by Congress in session, with proper communication thereon by the President of the United States, together with full facts of existent circumstances The President did not regard this matter of sufficient moment to call Congress into special session to consider same.

The conclusion of the President was reached after several weeks of investigation and consideration. No reason has been shown to excuse the usual constitutional procedure for the consideration of a matter of this importance.

NO NECESSITY FOR MORATORIUM

The necessity for the deferring of the payments of the intergovernmental debts to the United States by the 16 foreign powers affected by this resolution was not proved to the satisfaction of those subscribing to this minority report.

The selfsame arguments heard upon the consideration of the debt settlements advocated by the administration were heard anew. Generalities in respect of the financial structure of Germany was given voice. Germany was said to be unable to pay her reparations to seven or eight of these foreign countries affected by this measure. The other seven or eight countries affected by this resolution do not receive any sum from Germany in reparations (the names of these nations are not set forth herein, because of the fact that the hearings in which they were to be inserted are not available to us at this time).

Thus, this resolution would defer the payment of moneys to this country from seven or eight nations for value received, even though nothing is payable to them from Germany.

Germany is the nation to be helped. The sum of $6,000,000 is the only sum due by Germany to this country. No one even suggested that England, France, and Italy were not ready, willing, and able to pay their obligations to us on the due date. These three countries would pay to us during the fiscal year 1932 the sum of $224,227,125. The total amount of the payments deferred, including Germany's $6,000,000, is $252,566,803. Upon Thursday, December 10, 1931, Mr. Chamberlain, chancellor of the exchequer, is reported to have assured the House of Commons that all British foreign obligations could be and would be met.

No evidence was adduced before us that any of the foreign nations affected were financially unable and unwilling to make these payments. On the other hand, the nations affected by this resolution expended approximately $2,000,000,000 for armaments and war preparations within the last fiscal year.

We quote from the New York Times dated Sunday, August 2, 1931:

What nations spend on arms

Austria	$14,507,320
Belgium	33,303,200
Czechoslovakia	51,189,000
Estonia	5,520,000
Finland	16,457,500
France	466,960,000
Germany	171,923,040
British Empire	726,731,065
Greece	21,340,800
Hungary	20,200,000
Italy	248,946,500
Latvia	7,860,000
Lithuania	5,680,000
Poland	92,072,000
Rumania	53,647,200
Yugoslavia	50,458,000
Total	1,986,799,625

It is very interesting to note that when the sums so expended within one year by the British Empire, France, and Italy on arms are segregated from this list the total makes the startling sum of $1,424,637,565. It is peculiarly pertinent when we again remind the House that these three nations would only pay within the present fiscal year the sum of $224,227,125 upon their indebtedness to us.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ACTION WAS A STEP TOWARD FURTHER CONCESSION TO FOREIGN DEBTORS

This is a forerunner and a curtain raiser to debt cancellation or another moratorium. Be not deceived. Read the President's message. Read this resolution and read the hearings.

The President in his message to the present Congress recommended the re-creation of the World War Debt Commission.

Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, in what is reported to be a statement clarifying President Hoover's recommendations to Congress, on December 11, gave forth a public statement which is quoted in full as follows:

MR. MELLON DEFINES NATION'S POSITION ON DEBT CANCELLATION

"There should be no misinterpretation as to the administration's recommendations to Congress relating to the debts due us from foreign governments and the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. The administration is opposed to cancellation. No recommendation made carries any such implication.

"It is, however, the duty of those in authority to deal with realities, and there is no escaping the fact that some of our debtors can not meet in full the payments due us until there has been a substantial measure of economic recovery and that the position of others is so changed as to call for consideration of their present situation in the light of existing circumstances.

"Our debt settlements were effected on the basis of the capacity of the debtors to pay. As the President said in his statement of June 20, 'As the basis of the settlement of these debts was the capacity under normal conditions of the debtor to pay, we should be consistent with our own policies and principles if we take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world.'

"Take the case of Great Britain, our best customer, which even in the depression year 1930 took $678,000,000 worth of American agricultural and industrial products. The economic and financial changes of the past year have immensely increased the difficulty of her payments to us. The series of events through which Great Britain was forced off the gold standard are too recent to require enumeration.

"To-day the pound sterling is selling at $3.315 to the pound, which is a 32 per cent discount as compared with last year when it stood at tariff parity or $4.866. All debts to Great Britain from foreign governments, except reparation payments, which are not being collected at all this year, and are not likely to be collected in full next year, are payable in sterling. Her debt to us is payable in gold dollars. The combined effect of these unfavorable factors results in an enormously increased burden for the people of Great Britain.

"Payments during the present fiscal year will serve to exemplify the magnitude of the additional burden.

"With the pound sterling at par, the British Treasury needs 32,800,000 pounds in order to pay us $159,500,000. With the pound sterling at the rate at which it sold on December 10, 1931, it would take 48,100,000 pounds, or an increase of 15,300,000 pounds, or 47 per cent. Or, in other words, the burden on the British taxpayer is increased by almost one-half.

"When the British debt settlement was made it was estimated that its present value at 4¼ per cent was 80 per cent of the total amount due prior to funding. If the amount to be raised in pound sterling to meet the obligation to us in dollars is increased by 47 per cent, it becomes apparent that from the standpoint of the British taxpayer he is asked to meet not the obligation as established by our debt commission but an amount considerably in excess of such obligation.

"Nothing could more forcibly illustrate the changed situation which places on the executive as well as the legislative branch of Government the duty of reexamining the obligations of our debtors and their ability to meet them during a period of world-wide economic depression.

"Does anyone believe that Austria or Hungary should be asked to pay the installments due from them in view of the extraordinarily straitened circumstances in which the people of those two countries find themselves and great difficulty which they experience in obtaining foreign exchange for the purpose of carrying on even the minimum of effectual commerce with the rest of the world?

"Does anyone believe that Germany should be asked by the United States Government to meet her payments on the costs of the army of occupation when such a demand by us must be inevitably followed by demands of other creditors to pay her reparations in full?

"These instances should suffice to demonstrate that to stand on the letter of our bond and to refuse to investigate or to consider the facts, is to fail in our responsibility to the American people whom we represent and to the debtors whose capacity to pay we ourselves undertook to determine.

"What intelligent business man or banker would blindly refuse to investigate or to consider the altered circumstances of a debtor whose unsecured obligation he held? The situation of our debtors has been immensely altered during the course of the last two years. New questions in relation to these debts are bound to arise in the course of the next few months. The Congress should be in a position, through a commission created by it and composed in part of its own Members, to ascertain what the facts actually are and to deal with these new problems as they arise.

"It is with such thoughts as these in mind that the President recommended the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. I am confident that upon mature consideration this recommendation will commend itself to the Congress."

The administration bill was introduced by Mr. COLLIER, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, by request of the Treasury. This is the formal way of presenting the views of the Executive without in any manner binding the gentleman who would introduce it. It was the bill upon which the hearings were held. It is House Joint Resolution No. 123. We print it in full, as follows:

Joint resolution to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933

"Resolved, etc., That in the case of each of the following countries: Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to make, on behalf of the United States, an agreement with the government of such country to postpone the payment of any amount payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, by such country to the United States in respect of its bonded indebtedness to the United States, except that in the case of Germany the agreement shall relate only to amounts payable by Germany to the United States during such fiscal year in respect of the costs of the army of occupation.

"SEC. 2. Each such agreement on behalf of the United States shall provide for the payment of the postponed amounts, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum beginning July 1, 1933, in 10 equal annuities, the first to be paid during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1933, and one during each of the nine fiscal years following, each annuity to be payable in one or more installments.

"SEC. 3. No such agreement shall be made with the Government of any country unless it appears to the satisfaction of the President that such Government has made, or has given satisfactory assurances of willingness and readiness to make, with the government of each of the other countries indebted to such country in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts, an agreement in respect of such debt substantially similar to the agreement authorized by this joint resolution to be made with the Government of such creditor country on behalf of the United States.

"SEC. 4. Each agreement authorized by this joint resolution shall be made so that payments of annuities under such agreement shall, unless otherwise provided in the agreement, (1) be in accordance with the provisions contained in the agreement made with the Government of such country under which the payment to be postponed is payable, and (2) be subject to the same terms and conditions as payments under such original agreement."

It will be noted that what appears as section 5 in the resolution under discussion (probably) was not included in the administration measure.

This section reads as follows:

"SEC. 5. It is hereby expressly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy, or as implying favorable consideration at any time to a change in the policy hereby declared."

It may be that, with the knowledge of the sentiment in Congress and throughout the country against favoring foreign nations over our own country, the administration at this late date decides that moratoriums, debt reductions, and debt cancellations, at the expense of the American taxpayer, are not particularly popular. In any event, Congress is given the opportunity to give expression to its policy in this regard. We heartily concur in this amendment to the administration bill.

THE TIME ELEMENT

It was stated to us that the President reached his conclusion to initiate the moratorium on the 17th or 18th of June, 1931. His statement relative thereto was given publication on June 20, 1931. The wires to the Members receiving them were dated June 23, 1931. As we have noted, more than five and one-half months elapsed before Congress convened. No special session was called to consider this measure. Congress assembled Monday, December 7, 1931, and the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee were duly elected on that date. The administration measure was forwarded to Chairman Collier and immediately introduced by him on Monday, December 14. The hearings begun on the 15th were had in the mornings and afternoons of the 15th, 16th, and 17th. The bill was reported out, introduced in the House a few minutes before its adjournment on this date, December 17. It will be printed to-night and will be made available with the reports thereon to the Members to-morrow.

The hearings, while not so extensive in the testimony of the witnesses appearing before the committee, are not available at this time to the members of the committee nor to the Members of the House. There were considerable references made to documentary evidence which was agreed to be filed as a part of the evidence in support of this measure. These were not made available to the committee, and we are completely at a loss to know their contents.

We are in hearty accord with the dispatch of business. We have no criticism whatever of the manner in which the distinguished chairman of this committee has conducted the hearings, but we do submit that the membership of the committee should have had time to read the evidence and the documents called for by the evidence before preparing the reports, and the membership of the House should have had the opportunity to read the record and to digest it before being called on to vote on this momentous question.

CHANGE IN TERMS OF PROPOSAL

The final agreement reached on July 6, 1931, differed materially from that announced by President Hoover on June 20, 1931.

The initial proposal of the President, concerning which he sought the position of Members of Congress subsequent to the time when he had reached his conclusion, provided "postponement for one year of all intergovernmental debts."

It is patent that the postponement sought in this legislation is not for one year. It is true that the legislation treats of the payment of the debts for a 1-year period, but this deferred payment is strung out over a period of 10 years. It was admitted by the spokesman for the administration, Mr. Mills, that the President did not have in mind on June 20, 1931, the payment over a 10-year period of the indebtedness due for this fiscal year.

Further, as evidenced by the above quotation, the postponement was to be "of all intergovernmental debts." In the agreement finally reached France refused to accede to that proposal. All unconditional reparations due France from Germany are to be paid. There can be no doubt but that such condition is a deviation from the President's proposal. France is given a decided advantage in this respect.

In conclusion, we desire to call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that our revenues amount to only about one-half the amount of the expenditures of the Government; that we have a large deficit and it is growing by leaps and bounds and to withhold the collection of this $252,000,000 means that it must be raised in taxation from the people of the United States, amounting to more than $2 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. We commend the equitable maxim known to every lawyer—we should be just to the American people before we are generous to the peoples of Europe.

Respectfully submitted.

MORGAN G. SANDERS.

FRED M. VINSON.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the hearing before the Committee on Finance on the moratorium was very brief. In fact, Hon. Ogden Mills was the only witness who appeared before the committee, and his testimony was virtually the same as the testimony he gave in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

I express the hope that the joint resolution will be acted upon favorably by the Senate. I have every reason to believe that a great majority of Senators are in favor of its enactment, and I think it ought to be acted upon before the resolution for an adjournment over the holidays is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator spoke of the testimony of Mr. Ogden Mills taken before the Finance Committee. Has that been printed?

Mr. SMOOT. It has not been printed, but I say to the Senator that it was virtually the same as the testimony Mr. Mills gave before the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it in the hands of the printer at the present time?

Mr. SMOOT. It is.

Mr. JOHNSON. We will get it after we pass the moratorium?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether it will be printed by to-morrow morning or not, but I have asked that it be printed at as early a date as possible.

I repeat, the testimony of Mr. Mills before the Finance Committee was virtually the same as that he gave before the Ways and Means Committee of the House. The only reason for calling him before the Finance Committee was to allow members of that committee to ask any questions of Mr. Mills they desired to propound. He presented the matter so clearly and so succinctly that hardly a question was asked him.

I close by saying that, in my opinion, and I think it is the opinion of the other members of the committee, with the possible exception of one, this legislation is of vital importance, and the joint resolution should be passed before any holiday recess is taken. I trust that will be the case.

Mr. President, I ask that at 2 o'clock the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE ROCHDALE COOPERATIVE SYSTEM

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, this 21st day of December is the natal day of economic cooperation. It was on this date that the first economic society operating under what is known as cooperation was born. On the shortest, darkest day of the year, in 1844, 87 years ago to-day, at Toad Lane, in the little town of Rochdale, was opened the first genuine cooperative store known to history.

Mr. President, the history of this movement presents a picture particularly contrasting to present conditions throughout the world. The society was composed of 28 poor flannel weavers. For a year and a half they had saved their pennies until they had accumulated a pound each, and with that little capital of about $140 they opened up a little store. It was considered a joke and was the butt of ridicule at the time. The boys made sport of it as they passed, but it persisted. It had among its members one man at least of particular genius.

It succeeded upon three new, simple, and yet world-wide economic principles. The first of those principles is that in a cooperative enterprise one man shall have one vote. Capital does not vote. We in our country hear a great deal about individualism or individuality. But, Mr. President, under the competitive economic system, under the corporation system as organized in the United States, there is no such thing as individuality. We must go back to the cooperative idea to find genuine individuality, where one man has one vote. In the American corporation a man has no vote at all. In the American corporation capital alone votes and capital rules, and the thing miscalled "individuality" under the competitive system is in fact a capital autocracy.

These 28 flannel weavers set that principle aside and made man supreme in the management of economic affairs as we have done in the matter of political affairs in the United States. I want to say in passing that one of the 28 was a woman, Anne Tweedale, and this was the first time in the history of economics that I know of where women were recognized on equal terms with men in business affairs as they are now recognized on equal terms in political affairs in the United States.

Mr. President, the second principle was a limit upon the earnings of capital. Capital should be given a definite and a fixed wage the same as men are given definite and fixed wages. Under the competitive system capital is able to beat down the wages of men and take all the profits and earnings of the enterprise. There is no part of our competitive organization that is so destructive of prosperity as is that principle.

The third principle these weavers announced was that the earnings of the enterprise over and above the wages of men and the wages of capital should be distributed about like this: Twenty-five per cent of them should be kept in the enterprise so it would have a surplus to meet losses and so it would grow and become stronger. I think, perhaps, it was this provision that accounts for the success of cooperation as organized 87 years ago to-day. Then the balance of the earnings of the enterprise, over and above the amount retained for surplus, was to be distributed back to the members in proportion to the amount of business each member transacted with the enterprise.

Mr. President, I have stated but three little economic principles, and yet those three principles would mean an economic revolution throughout the world if they should be adopted and followed everywhere. They are growing. They are growing everywhere in the world. From that little beginning in Great Britain they have grown to be the greatest enterprise in all the Empire. There is no other single enterprise to compare to that growth and development. Those principles recognize men above property. They recognize democracy in business as well as democracy in government. In fact, democracy in government becomes a mockery when a financial autocracy rules over it, which is the direction of our drift in the United States up to date.

Now, what about the competitive system that has always ruled the world without challenge up until the organization of the Rochdale cooperatives, the equitable pioneers of 1844? Mr. President, there has been no stability in competitive business at any time. I placed in the RECORD of the Senate during the last session a chart, which I had on the wall of the Chamber of the Senate for some days, showing the condition during the last 50 years of American business. In the 50 years there were eight major depressions, and seven little ones thrown in for good measure. During the 50 years we spent about half of our time going into and getting out of depressions. On the authority of a former distinguished Member of this body I showed that 92 per cent of American business ultimately failed. I fear that before the present great depression, the greatest of all of them, shall have subsided that percentage will be increased rather than diminished.

Some have said to us that the present depression is caused by the war. The present depression in the United States could not have been caused by the war. That might be true and is generally true as applied to the rest of the world, but the United States was a profiteer out of the war. We owed foreign countries at the beginning of the war $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000. We were a debtor nation. In a very short time out of war profits we paid it all. We went into the war and we levied taxes upon war profits. We realized the enormous sum of $10,000,000,000 or $11,000,000,000 directly and indirectly by the taxation of war profits and of the profits resulting from the war after the war was over, and we loaned foreign countries that vast sum. Then private business out of war profits accumulated vast sums and loaned in foreign countries sums which I have seen estimated as high as $15,000,000,000 or $16,000,000,000 more. Our national debt was reduced to $16,000,000,000 mainly by taxes on war profits.

So any way we figure the situation in this country, the war was not the cause of our depression. The cause of it was competitive economics. It was the competitive economic system under which we—I was going to say "lived," but I had better say strived. Under our system we find this state of facts: The American people as a whole produce about 4 per cent a year of new wealth. That is all there is in the American pool of production in a series of years. That is all there has ever been in it from the time of the Declaration of Independence down to the present day. There have been some variations due to variations in the competitive system; but when it simmers down to a series of years, all the labor and all the capital and all the increase of property values, everything that goes to measure wealth production of our country, is measured by that little 4 per cent.

But, Mr. President, notwithstanding the fact that 4 per cent is our economic possibility under the competitive system, we organize many great corporations and great combinations. We send them out to fight for 5¾ per cent for the railroads, for instance, and that upon an enormously inflated valuation. Others go out fighting for 10 per cent and 40 per cent and 100 per cent. That organization puts us in a constant state of economic warfare. The result of that warfare is that a few win, a few succeed, and many go down in defeat and disaster. Those that succeed are usually the giants, usually the great corporations and the great combinations. Those that fail, of course, are the ordinary organizations, much greater in number. It is for this reason that 92 per cent or more of American enterprises ultimately fail.

Mr. President, we hear it said that the Government ought to stay out of business, and yet I have been on committees of the Senate the past few days where the great institutions of the country are now asking that the Government come into business and take them out of the deplorable conditions which this system of competitive economics has brought to our country. Here are the railroads, first before the Interstate Commerce Commission and now before the Committee on Banking and Currency, demanding first a 15 per cent increase in rates and now that a great giant governmental corporation be organized to finance them through their difficulties. Then comes the competitive banking system asking for a similar kind of relief. But, Mr. President, while I discuss the demands of the great competitive banking systems of the country, I have a different story to tell of a cooperative banking system in the United States whose representatives just at the noon hour appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The Association of Mutual Savings Banks, a cooperative system of banks with many billions of dollars of deposits, with many billions of dollars of investment, came before our committee just now and said, "We are in a more prosperous condition than when the depression began. Our deposits have increased enormously. Our securities are sound. We need no relief from the Government of the United States." That is the one bright spot that has appeared in the Banking and Currency Committee up to date during the course of the hearings on the measure to authorize a $2,000,000,000 governmental corporation in the effort to relieve competitive economics from present disastrous conditions.

Mr. President, the situation as to the mutual or cooperative banks in the United States is only parallel with the development of cooperation all over the world. In Great Britain they were hit a hundred times harder by the war than were we in the United States; they were enormous losers; their tax burden is many times our tax burden in the United States; yet to-day they have less unemployment in proportion than have we; their business is in better condition than is ours, and the great cooperative business that grew out of the little store started by these 28 flannel weavers 87 years ago to-day is one of the most prosperous in this world at this moment. It has gone through all this calamitous era relying upon those principles just as the mutual banks of New York have gone through the present situation in the United States. With that little store as a beginning, development has been so great that there are now 6,000 and more of those stores in Great Britain.

They have at Newcastle upon Tyne a wholesale establishment as big as Marshall Field's; they have one bigger at Glasgow, and they have one three and one-half times as big as that at Manchester, doing business all around the world. They have 6,000 little cooperative banks as branches, usually in these cooperative stores, and in the wholesale department they have a great reserve cooperative bank with a turnover of more than $4,000,000,000 a year. That giant system, now the largest individual business in all the British Empire, founded upon these three simple principles, takes competition out of business by giving one man one vote in business and by limiting the earnings of capital to a reasonable wage.

But it is said, "You can not limit the earnings of capital in a country; that is socialistic or bolshevistic or something similar." Well, this same cooperative system, after the soviet revolution, went into Russia; in fact, it had been there before. The Soviet Government confiscated it, as it did all other business in the beginning, and converted it into a state enterprise, but it did not work so well. Then they turned it back, and even the last message of Nicolai Lenin himself to the soviet congress recommended that they restore cooperation and support and encourage it, even as they did communism itself.

So, Mr. President, communism called in cooperative economics to steady its course and to stabilize its success, and I believe a great part of the success that is now evident in Russian development is due to that change in economic policy. We have heard competitive economics say that when they put in piecework or a little private store or something of that kind that they had retreated, but some of us have never heard perhaps that they returned to cooperation, and that cooperation is building their success.

The collective farms in Russia about which we have read—and about 60 per cent of them now are reorganized in that way—are all cooperative organizations. There have been a few state farms organized, but the great majority are cooperative.

In the United States we have launched upon the policy of cooperation. We created a Federal Farm Board and we gave it $500,000,000 to stabilize the surplus and to assist in the organization of cooperatives. Have they done it? No. They have organized some, but they went out in competition with others, and their big, giant organizations are corporations under the laws of Delaware; they are not cooperative at all.

Mr. President, every time there has been an attempt to short-circuit these three Rochdale cooperative principles, every time there has been an attempt to organize something called cooperation on any other basis, it has failed, whereas there is no record of failure where they have been truly organized and efficiently managed upon those principles.

In this English system they organized their little store; after it succeeded others were organized. There were several hundred of them. Then they met and decided to organize a wholesale department. The stores took all the capital of the wholesale department; no individual subscribed for any capital, and the same three principles were adopted. Each store had votes for its control according to its membership.

The capital earning was limited the same as in the individual stores; of the trade dividend 25 per cent was retained for the wholesale department, so it might grow and become stronger and more successful; and the balance of the earnings were distributed to the stores in proportion to the business that they had with the wholesale. Those profits then were distributed on down to the membership in their own trade dividends. The wholesale succeeded at once. By and by it was noticed that many of their stores failed as ours do. They did not meet their notes at the bank and the sheriff sold them out. So they said, "We would do better if we had our own banking system." Then they put in the cooperative banking system about which I have spoken.

But what has the American system done to our cooperative banks? I say to you that the great bankers who rule over our banking system in this country, who have brought it to its present plight and have brought this country to the lowest depth of depression in all our history, have persistently fought cooperative laws all over these United States. They persistently kept out of the cooperative laws of all the States provision for a cooperative banking system, until a few years ago I succeeded in getting such a statute in the laws of the State of Iowa, which, however, had some jokers in it, so that there can not be organized as yet a reserve bank. However, it was the great bankers of this country who looked after these laws. I know that, because when I first came to Congress they "looked after" me. They came to me and said, "Lay off the cooperative banks; the big banks are in favor of it, but if you start anything on cooperative banking you will turn them against it." That was the approach they made; but I understood the system and, of course, I listened to no such sophistry as that. One of the persistent fights I have been making all the time is to present to the Senate and the Congress a comprehensive cooperative banking system and to show how the Rochdale system has succeeded not only in England but in other countries. I visited 15 different countries and saw it in operation, and in those countries, in spite of war, in spite of revolutions, and in spite of depression, it is a success to-day; but I say to you, Mr. President, that cooperation had not succeeded in any of those countries until they established a cooperative banking system, a system of credit as a foundation and basis upon which the cooperative system itself must stand.

Mr. President, I want to close my remarks to-day by asking unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the names of the men who organized this first cooperative association. Let me say that the only economic shrine in this world, the only place on this big round earth where people go at the present time and have gone for years just because of what was done there of purely an economic nature, and for no other reason, is this little building where the Rochdale store started in 1844. It has now been taken over by the Rochdale system, and every year there is a pilgrimage to that store, like many of the religious pilgrimages of the world; and the people who go there go because those three principles of cooperation are the principles of the golden rule and of the Sermon on the Mount itself in business.

Here, Mr. President, are the names of the 28 humble people who established this system which will mean in the near future the economic revolution of this world. I ask that the names may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the names will be printed in the RECORD.

The names referred to are as follows:

EMPLOYMENT OF ATTORNEY BY POWER COMMISSION

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, earlier in the day I explained to the Senate that I would later want to ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Judiciary Committee and ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill thus reported. From the Committee on the Judiciary I now ask unanimous consent to report favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 930) to amend section 109 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 21) thereon. I likewise ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be received. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Nebraska that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] spoke to me about that matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; he also spoke to me, but he is quite willing that I should have the bill taken up in his absence.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill if it shall not lead to any discussion.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it will.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I have no objection to its consideration.

Mr. McNARY. Is the measure reported by the Senator a bill or resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. It is a bill recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the bill be reported for the information of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest in order to save time that the secretary read the substitute bill which the committee has reported.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me say that the reading of the bill will really give the Senate no real information concerning it. Will not the Senator from Nebraska state instead the general character of the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. I shall be glad to do that, although I think I explained the bill this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Power Commission is engaged in the consideration of an application for a license known as the New River case. For reasons that are quite obvious, I think, to those who know about it, the Power Commission desires to employ an attorney. The Department of Justice is making no objection; in fact, the Department of Justice drew the original bill, which the committee has amended. It is another case exactly like that presented to the Senate when we authorized the employment of Mr. Roberts, now an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. Under the law the Power Commission can not employ this attorney unless he will give up all business that he may have against the United States during the pendency of the suit in connection with which he represents the United States. The attorney has other cases, some of them cases against the United States, none of them, however, having any relation to the subject matter of the litigation here. In order to relieve him from that penalty the bill is brought before the Senate; and its importance will be more fully recognized when I tell the Senate that the work of the attorney is immediate, and it will be necessary for him to go to work at once before Congress shall reconvene after the holiday recess.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Did the report of the bill have the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to immediate consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Huston Thompson is the attorney they have employed. He is a former member of the Federal Trade Commission. I think most Senators are acquainted with him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That nothing in sections 109 and 113 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, as amended (U. S. C., title 18, secs. 198 and 203), or of any other act of Congress forbidding any person in the employ of the United States or acting in any official capacity under them from acting as agent or attorney for another before any department or branch of the Government or from receiving pay for so acting shall be deemed to apply to counsel serving in the case of the Appalachian Electric Power Co. v. George Otis Smith et al., now pending in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code with respect to counsel in the case of the Appalachian Electric Power Co. v. George Otis Smith et al."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask that the Presiding Officer, if he can do such a thing, instruct the clerks at the desk to transmit this bill to the House of Representatives as soon as possible, because it will be of no avail unless it is passed by that body to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That instruction will be given.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 142) making an additional appropriation for the Employment Service, Department of Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and it was signed by the Vice President.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

BATTLEFIELDS IN UNITED STATES FOR COMMEMORATIVE PURPOSES (S. DOC. NO. 27)

Mr. REED. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs, I send to the desk a message from the President of the United States, which was laid before the Senate and referred to the Military Committee on the 19th instant, and ask that it may be printed as a Senate document, with illustrations. This is the annual report on the survey of battlefields, and we have taken similar action in former years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

GENERAL DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE AT GENEVA (S. DOC. NO. 26)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my message on foreign affairs which was communicated to the Congress on the 10th day of this month, I spoke of the invitation which this Government has accepted to participate in the General Disarmament Conference which is to meet at Geneva on February 2, 1932. I spoke also in that message of the interest of this Government in supporting the efforts of this conference in accordance with the traditional policy of the American Nation to meet with the other nations of the world and to offer its cooperation in any endeavor which has in view the reduction of the huge burdens which result from unnecessarily heavy and costly armaments.

I am transmitting herewith and I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress a report on the subject from the Secretary of State in which he requests that authorization be made for an appropriation to defray the expenses of sending an American delegation to Geneva for the purpose of representing the United States at the conference.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 21, 1931.

FOREIGN-DEBT MORATORIUM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933.

Mr. HOWELL obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. HOWELL. I do.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, we have treated our European debtors with such generosity that there is no parallel in history for our action; and yet what we have done is not appreciated—certainly not in Europe—and, unfortunately, not by our own people.

The reason for this is that there has been great confusion in the minds of a large proportion of our population as to the final disposition that has been made of the debts due us. This confusion is quite understandable. Not only are the sums involved so enormous that they are hardly comprehendible—totaling, as they do, $12,091,000,000—but the statements in reference thereto as to what we are to receive made by responsible officials have often been involved, if not contradictory.

Furthermore, what we have done for our European debtors is not appreciated by many of our people because the annual payments we have had and are to receive have not been clearly placed in juxtaposition with the annual interest we are paying on the money we borrowed to loan our European debtors—interest that has averaged for the past 6 years $500,000,000 per annum.

It is one thing to loan from your surplus. Quite another to borrow money from a bank to loan your friend in need. If he does not pay, you are not released. You must meet your interest payments though he fail you. If he does not pay it is "dead horse" for you, and every time you pay interest at the bank there is another funeral.

What the American people have been suffering from is the failure of our European debtors to shoulder their obligations to us. As a consequence, we have not only had to shoulder the principal sums of their debts but, in addition thereto, deficits in interest; that is, the difference between the totals of the debtors' payments made us each year and the interest we must pay upon the money we have borrowed to loan them.

The only way to bring home the meaning of this is to consider some particular debt, as, for instance, the French debt:

When we settled with France as of June 30, 1925, there was due us from the French people in round numbers $4,231,000,000—a sum almost too great for the average mind to comprehend. Since then France has paid six annual installments, all that we will receive up to July 1, 1932, if this moratorium is approved.

What was the meaning of the settlement we made with France

On June 19, 1929, the Senate went on record to the effect that our settlement with France was equivalent to the cancellation of the principal sum of that debt, totaling $4,231,000,000, and that France in lieu thereof was to pay us but 2⅛ per cent thereon annually for a period of 62 years, and then France was to be through; she need pay us no more. But, Mr. President, for the last six years the average annual interest we have paid to carry this debt is nearly double this 2⅛ per cent, which France is to pay, or 4⅛ per cent.

Even this statement does not convey to the mind the unparalleled treatment we have afforded France. Not only have we canceled her debt of $4,231,000,000, but during the 6-year period ending July 1, 1930, we paid out in interest to carry this debt of $4,231,000,000 the sum of $1,058,000,000, while during that same period France paid us only $200,000,000, leaving a deficit for the American people to shoulder of $858,000,000 in interest alone—yet only 6 years of the 62 years have been tolled off.

In short, our generosity to France during the war cost us $4,231,000,000—the canceled principal sum of her debt. Then during the past six years it has cost us $1,058,000,000 more in interest to carry the debt, and during all that time France has helped us in this gigantic task by contributing but $200,000,000 all told.

Mr. President, our interest loss alone, due to this French debt, has totaled $858,000,000 during the last six years; and if this proposed moratorium is approved, this interest loss to the American people will rise to $1,027,000,000 by the first day of July 1932.

Is it not about time for us to give consideration to the American people and not wholly to the welfare of the rank and file of the French?

France is not an indigent. She has more gold in her Treasury per inhabitant than has the United States. France was to pay us an additional $50,000,000 this year; but if this proposed moratorium is approved by Congress, France will be relieved of her obligation to make this additional $50,000,000 contribution. But how much will it cost us in interest this proposed-moratorium year to carry her debt? It will cost the American people in round numbers $169,000,000 in interest alone.

This is an example of the meaning of our European-debt settlements and what will result from this moratorium. Now, when we are confronted, as we are, with a Treasury deficit of $1,800,000,000, which may reach $2,500,000,000 before the end of this fiscal year, a nation—aided in an extremity by us through loans the interest on which will cost us $169,000,000 this proposed-moratorium year—is to be relieved of helping us out to the extent of $50,000,000, and all of the $169,000,000 of interest is to be left for the backs of the American people.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I feel very confident that a great majority of the Members of the Senate will feel as the Senator from Nebraska does, that we have been, in a way, overgenerous with these European debtors in connection with the settlements made with them. I do not believe that anyone feels like making any further concessions by reason of any regard we have for their situation, or other considerations of like character. Quite a good many, however, including myself, acceded to the desire of the President that we should extend this moratorium because of repercussions in this country growing out of the situation arising in Europe. I presume the Senator will address himself to that phase of the controversy later.

Mr. HOWELL. It is my intention to do so.

Now, at the risk of occupying the time of the Senate unnecessarily, I shall attempt to illustrate further the meaning of the French debt and the part which France is playing as a debtor.

I shall do this by reducing the sums involved by dividing by 1,000,000. The French debt of $4,231,000,000 is equivalent to 1,000,000,000 mortgages of $4,231 each. Because of the money we borrowed to loan France, we will pay in interest this year $169 to carry one of these mortgages. France, as a debtor, has agreed to pay us this year $50 on account of this mortgage; but if this moratorium is approved, she will pay us nothing, although up to the present time—and it is now 1931—France has paid, all told, on one of these mortgages but a total of $200. Notwithstanding this fact, France seeks a further avoidance of her debt, if not complete forgiveness.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. This moratorium proposition does not involve any cancellation of interest or principal. Is there any inference to be drawn from its language that it means cancellation, or scaling down, or anything of that sort? Does it not provide merely an extension of the time within which to pay? Is not that all there is to it?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I assume the Senator was not in the Chamber when I began. I prefaced my remarks by calling attention to the great generosity we have shown to France.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Very great, indeed; and to all other debtor nations.

Mr. HOWELL. I attempted to convey some idea of the meaning of this enormous debt and its cancellation.

I will now answer the question of the able Senator from California by calling his attention to business transactions. It has been my experience that if I ever prevailed on a judgment-proof debtor to agree, after I had made great concessions, to make certain payments, and, in the vernacular of the street, he "crossed his heart and hoped to die" that he would make those payments, I have found that the only way for me to get that money was to be on his doorstep at the hour when each payment was due, and that if I ever let such a payment go by the chances were I would never get it. I think that is the general experience in private business. I do not regard public business as different from private business. The same principles are involved. The same experience may be expected in public affairs as in private affairs and the nations with which we are dealing are judgment proof.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to add a word, I do not want the Senator from Nebraska or any other person in the United States or in any other country of the world to misunderstand my position. I indicated that I would vote in favor of extending these payments, but at the same time, in language as positive and definite as I could make use of, I expressed the position I then held—and it is the position I now hold—namely, that I was and I am opposed to cancellation of any of these foreign nations' debts. I was—I am—opposed to opening up those agreements, which were entered into after due consideration and the utmost generosity on our part.

I believe these foreign nations should observe those contracts and carry out their legal and moral obligations. So, with great deference to many Senators with whose views I agree in so many ways, it has occurred to me that we ought to take the word of the President of the United States to this effect—that he is opposed to cancellation of these or any of these debts. I may add that by this action we are not expressing any willingness or any intention on our part further to extend the payment due this year or to cancel or modify the agreements constitutionally entered into between us and foreign nations. Wherefore I say that it seems to me the only question is, Shall we extend the date of payment and, instead of the money due being paid this year, let its payment run over a period of 10 years, as set forth in the joint resolution?

I wanted to say that here and now lest I be misunderstood on account of the question I put to the Senator a moment ago.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, Congress has the power to do as it deems wise and best. In business transactions it is supreme. The President may make a disposition respecting some business matter and may have overlooked something in connection therewith. Under such circumstances it would be perfectly proper, if discovered by the Congress, that the Congress should correct the oversight. There should be no resentment. There should be no feeling. He did propose a moratorium. In what I am now going to say will be found a further answer to the question of the Senator from California.

The President proposed that it should not merely be a moratorium, for which we were to be the "goat," but that other nations should be "goats" also, if there were any intergovernmental debts due them. He expected to be seconded in that position. But France said: "No; we will not agree. There are certain unconditional reparations due us from Germany. They amount to $125,000,000 per annum. They must be excepted." So France is to escape being the "goat" so far as this $125,000,000 is concerned. But it will be said that France has agreed to loan this money to Germany. True; but how?

The other day the president of the National City Bank, of New York, and the National City Co., of New York, was before the Finance Committee of the Senate. When the question was put to him as to whether it was not strange that the American people and others would loan Germany on its bonds $500,000,000, $208,000,000 of which were distributed in this country, in view of the fact that recently Germany had practically wiped out every creditor of that nation by the inflation of her currency, what was the answer? The answer was, "No; there is a way to take care of that," and the way it was taken care of in this case was that certain of Germany's resources were earmarked for the payment of those bonds. Therefore he, as president of the National City Co. and the National City Bank, had no hesitation in distributing those bonds to the people of the United States.

That is exactly what France will do when she loans this $125,000,000. Certain German resources must be earmarked or they can not borrow this $125,000,000. If that is fair for France, why would it not be fair for the United States to say: "You are doing this, Premier Laval. Why should we not provide for safety in the same way? You pay us the $50,000,000 and we will loan it to you just as you have loaned it to Germany, but you must earmark some of the resources of France as a guaranty of the repayment of this loan."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to read one sentence from the statement which the President issued as of June 20, 1931? I hope it will be printed in big type that all of us may remember it and those absent may read it:

> I do not approve in any remote sense of the cancellation of the debts to us.

I referred to that a moment ago. That was his position then. It has been his position ever since, and, so far as I know, is the President's position now.

Mr. HOWELL. In his message to Congress respecting this matter, the President suggested the re-creation of the Debt Funding Commission and he also suggested that it might be necessary to reduce the payments in connection with some of these debts. He had in mind France. Premier Laval had been here shortly before. He has announced that there could be no reduction in German reparations unless we would reduce the payments that were to come from France to the Government of the United States. The purpose of the suggestion that we reestablish the War Debt Commission was not for revising the debts upward. That must be evident. The purpose was to revise them downward. We have already canceled the principal sums. Every dollar we reduce the annual payments due from France to us to help us pay interest on the huge sums of borrowed money that we have outstanding, every dollar we reduce is a further cancellation, pure and simple.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator does not favor reduction of the debt, does he? Does the Senator from Nebraska favor scaling down the indebtedness?

Mr. HOWELL. Indeed I do not.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I fully agree with the Senator.

Mr. HOWELL. But I am pointing out that the President evidently does.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator may draw that inference; I do not.

Mr. HOWELL. I draw that inference from his message, and I think it is a perfectly proper inference to draw. I have respect for President Hoover's views, but I do not agree with all of them. I certainly do not agree with him so far as the proposed treatment of this indebtedness is concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether the Senator knows exactly what this means in the way of dollars and cents. I do not know whether the Senator is going to bring that out or not. But I want to say that the moratorium for one year simply means that there shall be delayed for one year the payment of $184,000,000 interest—interest, mind you—and $68,000,000 of principal. That is what the 1-year moratorium means so far as money is concerned to the United States.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I realize that the total amount to be postponed if the moratorium is approved is $247,000,000, in round numbers.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is $252,000,000.

Mr. HOWELL. I have it from the Treasury Department as $247,000,000; but if it is $252,000,000, I thank the Senator for the correction.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Treasury Department is only $5,000,000 out of the way, please do not say anything about the Treasury Department, because that is the smallest mistake it ever made.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no mistake about it. The difference is about $6,000,000, and that $6,000,000 is for the German-occupation debt. The Senator from Nebraska has not included that $6,000,000. The difference is that $6,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is $6,000,000 when the Senator is going to put it on the American people anyway? It is of no consequence.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator thought, of course, the Treasury of the United States was mistaken, and that a mistake of $5,000,000 does not amount to anything.

Mr. JOHNSON. We will admit even the omnipotence of the Secretary of the Treasury, if the Senator desires, because we want to hurry this debate.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is what I want to do.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought the Senator was delaying it.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; I know what the Senator thought.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is right. I have not considered the amount which was allotted to us from Germany under the Young plan. I am merely considering the debts of the 15 nations that are indebted to us for loans and advances made out of the United States Treasury.

I might say this, and I want to say it right here, inasmuch as the matter has been referred to: The $250,000,000 that was allowed us for expenses of our troops during the German occupation does not equal the total sum spent by any means. I want to say further that Germany made appropriations to pay the costs of occupation and we stood back and let the other nations get all the money. If it had been a private transaction, those responsible would have been called upon the carpet, but those responsible seem to have acquired the notion, from the way we loaned money after the war, that we wanted to be Santa Claus to Europe, and so if there was any money about to be paid us and anybody else wanted it, we were to stand aside and let them have it. That is what we did in connection with the appropriations for the costs of the German occupation, and that is the reason why now this item appears.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator mentioned that part of the President's message where the suggestion is made about re-creating the Debt Commission, implying that that suggestion meant revision of the debts, a revision downward. I want to call to the attention of the Senator an extension of that idea in the President's message. I find that it reads like this:

> But as the basis of the settlement of those debts was the capacity under normal conditions of the debtor to pay, we should be consistent with our own policies and principles if we take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world.

He said further:

> I am sure the American people have no desire to attempt to extract any sum beyond the capacity of any debtor to pay and it is our view that broad vision requires that our Government should recognize the situation as it exists.

There is one condition that exists that I think we should recognize, and that is that the capacity of nations owing us money to-day has not as yet been tested.

The Senator referred to payments made by France, I think, of $50,000,000. As a matter of fact, France has never paid the Government of the United States one cent by efforts of its own people; neither has Great Britain. Every cent that has been paid to the United States Government on account of interest on these loans has been collected from Germany, and most of it was borrowed here.

If the Senator will permit me for another moment, the President says:

> We are not involved in the discussion of strictly European problems, of which the payment of German reparations is one.

Well, if we are not concerned with the payment of reparations, which Germany can not pay anyway, then the question is confined to governments that owe us, and the President implies that they are not able to pay.

I want to call attention to the fact that their ability to pay has not yet been tested; they have not denied that they are able to pay.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I think that is attested by the fact that this moratorium was volunteered by the President. In the various debt-settlement agreements there is either a general or a specific clause providing for postponement of payments, but the Treasury Department will state that it has no such request. This moratorium, as stated, is volunteered. Seven nations that do not get a dollar from German reparations are to be beneficiaries, and one nation is to benefit thereby that secured a loan from the United States as late as 1929. I am speaking of Greece.

ITALIAN DEBT

Mr. President, what we have done for France, the sacrifices that our people will have to make in years to come for France, are only exceeded by the sacrifices they are to make in behalf of Italy. Italy owes us, or did owe us at the time of the debt settlement, just about half of what France owed us. She is only to pay us one-fourth as much as France is to pay. That was one of the most absurd settlements that was reported to the Senate and the House of Representatives. The time will come when historians reviewing these settlements will wonder what was the matter with the American people or with the statesmen who represented them; and I believe that the action taken will ultimately be charged to an inferiority complex.

Mr. President, the negotiators from Europe who came here knew all about what interest meant; they were thoroughly informed. They realized that in the case of a short-time loan the principal sum is the all-important thing, but that in the case of a long-time obligation interest is the all-important thing. I can imagine now how they sat around the table and the debtors said: "In these negotiations we accept in principle that we must pay the principal sums of these debts, but, of course, gentlemen, you will be easy in the matter of interest." What was the result? They knew what the result would be. In the case of France they knew that it meant the total cancellation of the principal sum of $4,231,000,000, and in lieu thereof the payment of 2⅛ per cent annually on the face of that debt for 62 years, and then France is to be through, the commission taking the position that they could judge and determine then that France would not be able to pay another 2⅛ per cent during the sixty-third year. The commission assumed to be so accurate in its determinations of ability to pay that they could say positively that France could make 62 payments of 2⅛ per cent and no more.

It may be said, "Would you keep them paying forever?" That is what Britain has been doing in connection with her national debt. It was the policy of Britain not to pay, and it has also been the policy of France from 1815 down to the present time.

Italy owed the United States $2,150,000,000 at the time of the settlement of 1925, and about one-third was due to borrowings after, not during, the war. During the six years which have elapsed since 1925, the American people have been paying interest on that $2,150,000,000, because the United States Government borrowed it and still owes it, and the bonds which represent that sum bear interest; and the total interest paid during the last six years on the securities representing the Italian debt, amounts to $537,500,000.

Stop, Mr. President and Senators, and think for a moment what that means! Here is a debt that Italy owes us; the money which we loaned Italy was borrowed from our people; we are still paying interest thereon, and during the last six years the interest paid amounts, in round numbers, to $538,000,000. Do you know, Mr. President, how much Italy has paid us during that time? Hold your breath! She has paid us $38,800,000. That is all. She was to have paid us $14,700,000 this year; but if we adopt this moratorium proposal, of course, none of that will be paid. By the end of the present fiscal year the net cost to the American people of carrying this Italian debt, over and above everything Italy has paid us, will amount to $584,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will recall, however, in fairness, that Mr. Mussolini gave out a public statement last summer when this matter first came up saying that Italy was prepared and perfectly willing to pay that which she had promised to pay, and that she had not asked for a moratorium.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Tennessee for that information. Certainly, in the state of our finances, if there is some debtor willing to pay us, does not the Senator think that we should allow him to do so—even ask him to do so?

Mr. McKELLAR. Indeed I do. With a Treasury that has a deficit of seventeen or eighteen hundred million dollars, I think it is exceedingly foolish to remit debts that are honestly, fairly, and justly due us, and put the taxation upon the American people, rather than let the debtors who want to pay their debts pay them.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from Tennessee, I will state that not only, as he has informed the Senate, is Italy ready and willing to pay, but at least one payment has been made by one nation and that payment is in the hands of the Treasury, and the Treasury is holding it in abeyance so that, when this moratorium shall have been adopted, the payment can be returned.

Mr. McKELLAR. What nation is that.

Mr. HOWELL. That nation is Greece.

Allow me again to say that public business in no wise differs from private business; and I think you will agree with me that if any merchant had on his books an account against a judgment-proof debtor who came in and said, "I am ready to make payment when that account is due," and the merchant refused the offer, his associates or his family would be asking for a conservator. They would ask the courts to intervene; but, some way or somehow, it seems that the United States Government can violate every principle that is recognized in private business and still survive. At least so far as these debts are concerned, Mr. President, our sins have overtaken us. We are now confronted with a huge deficit.

I only regret that I am unable to bring home more clearly to the mind of everyone within reach of my voice the meaning of these debts, what the cancellations have amounted to, and what burdens have been transferred to bend the backs of the American people.

Let us consider all the debts taken together. They amount to a total of $12,090,700,000. Let us call it $12,000,000,000 in round numbers. That is what these debts amounted to at the time of settlement. From time to time you will notice in the papers statements to the effect that these debts total anywhere from $10,000,000,000 to $11,000,000,000. There was an initial cancellation in the case of every one of these debts.

In other words, our representatives sitting around the table said: "Yes; we will throw that off, and that and that. Never mind the change." Finally, the total of the debts was reduced before the agreements were approved to $11,565,000,000. That is, about a half billion was thrown off for the sake of good-fellowship before they really got down to business. They started from this new taw in each case and then completed their settlements. But taking all the debts together, they were actually twelve billions and some ninety-one millions.

Every debt was canceled upon the agreement of the nations to pay in lieu thereof, taken all together, 2⅝ per cent on this $12,091,000,000 annually for 62 years. Then they are through. They are never to pay us another dollar; and for the last six years the interest that we have paid upon those debts has exceeded $500,000,000 annually. Last year all we received from these countries in toto was $235,000,000. Subtract that from $500,000,000 and it will be noted that we lost $265,000,000 on account of interest alone.

In other words, the burden of these debts has been increasing $265,000,000 a year. It will increase about $235,000,000 this year, whether we have a moratorium or not; and if we have a moratorium it will increase about $483,000,000—transferred from the shoulders of the people of Europe to our people.

You might properly ask, "How much has the interest deficit on account of these twelve billions of debts amounted to since their settlement?"

Mr. President, I trust I may be able to make myself clear. During the last six years we have paid an average of $500,000,000 a year in interest on these twelve billions; but so little have the European nations paid us since their debt settlements that our loss on account of interest alone, should the moratorium be ratified, will amount to $2,369,000,000 by the end of the present fiscal year; and we have just begun. That is the burden that our international bankers and those who favor Europe over America have been willing to shoulder upon the people of this country.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. GORE. That amount would have met the yawning deficit in the Treasury.

Mr. HOWELL. It would more than have met the deficit in the Treasury. By the end of this fiscal year it would have met the total deficit we are expecting and we would then have had a substantial balance left. For that reason I have unhesitatingly stated time and again that the deficit in our Treasury to-day is due to the fact that Europe has not shouldered its own debts but has saddled them on the American people, and we must pay; yes, and just the other day Secretary Mellon notified us that it was probable the national debt would be increased by $3,000,000,000!

Mr. President, the policies that have been adopted and are now being urged with relation to these debts are certain to bend the backs of children yet unborn.

I have already stated that this proposed moratorium was volunteered by the President of the United States; that all of these debt agreements have in them provisions of one kind or another for the postponement of debt payments; and that there are no requests under these agreements for any such postponements on file with the Treasury Department. Why, then, in the face of a growing Treasury deficit, did the President suggest that a moratorium be granted each one and all of our European debtors? Why was such action taken?

Mr. President, I believe it will generally be admitted that this proposal of a moratorium was an attempt to stabilize the economic situation in Europe and indirectly throughout the world, to the end of assuring the continuance of peace, because all know that war is not an unusual result of untoward economic conditions. That was the purpose of the President's action; however, a little thought must render it evident that the proposed moratorium can prove but a symptomatic treatment, that it will not and can not reach the seat of the disorder.

What is threatening the peace of Europe—and of the world, for that matter? Why the persistent tension? Why the brooding uncertainty? There is just one answer—the treaty of Versailles.

Mr. President, France and Germany are two great military nations. Each has a brilliant background of martial successes. One marked difference between them is that France, so far as population is concerned, is static, whereas the Germans have shown great fecundity. As a consequence, Germany's man power is greater than that of France; and it undoubtedly will be admitted that if the recent war had been between Germany and France alone, France probably would have gone down in defeat. Because of the action of other European powers, however, and finally because of our participation, France was able to triumph. Germany is disarmed. France is armed to the teeth. Germany is paying reparations. France is collecting more than one-half. Germany has been stripped of her colonies. France is enjoying part of these spoils.

Yet, potentially, so far as man power is concerned, it is acknowledged that Germany is superior to France. Moreover, anyone acquainted with German character knows that just as France thought of "revanche" after 1870 so do the Germans again think of "der Tag"; and I believe if each one here present would ask his inner self whether or no the last military act of the great drama involving France and Germany has taken place, each would say "No," because all realize the high tension that persists between the two Nations. It is a tension that permeates the world. It is the cause of the unstable equilibrium of which all the world is conscious. France is keenly alive to this reality and as a consequence has been and will continue seeking guaranties for her safety by other nations. It must be admitted that unless France disarms—and she can not under the circumstances—there will be no disarmament for Europe.

There can be no disarmament until this international tension is relieved—until there is no longer reason for a "der Tag." So when I say that this moratorium gesture by the President was and is inadequate so far as peace is concerned, and constitutes merely a treatment of a symptom, it must be admitted that I am right.

Mr. President, I have pointed out to the Senate what we have done for France and also what we have done for our other European debtors taken together. I have endeavored to make it plain that our generosity has been unparalleled; that it means great sacrifices now, and into the next—yes, on into the second generation, for us; that not only have we done our share for peace but far more than our share.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask Senators whether they do not think it is high time that if more sacrifices are to be made that there should be such cooperation by our European debtors as to assure that what we may do further will reach the cause of the situation instead of merely palliating the symptom or symptoms which President Hoover has sought and is seeking to treat. I do—and to that end I offer an amendment to the pending joint resolution which I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. HOWELL. I would like to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Nebraska moves, on page 2, line 25, after the words "United States," to insert a semicolon and the following:

nor shall such agreement be made with any government until it shall have effectively assented, in a form and manner satisfactory to the President, to the reformation of the Versailles treaty, including the return to the German Government of its former but now mandated colonies.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I ask for the immediate consideration of this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to announce that my colleague the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD an interview with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] by Mr. William Hard, on the subject of our foreign debts, which appeared in the Washington Star on last Saturday.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REED, OF PENNSYLVANIA, ANALYZES THE FOREIGN-DEBT SITUATION IN FRANK TERMS

By William Hard

Senator DAVID A. REED, of Pennsylvania, has furnished the most spectacular political incident of this Congress so far. This writer queried him upon it, as follows:

"President Hoover and Secretary of State Stimson and Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, your dear Pittsburgh friend, don't think so much of your speech against any further reducing right now of European governmental indebtedness to the United States Treasury. Why did you break with them?"

The Senator looked as disgusted as he often looks. He queried in return:

"Can't anybody think that a man can differ with another man without breaking with him? I'm not attacking anybody. I'm just explaining my own vote."

"Won't you explain it further? Do you deny that Europe needs further 'relief' from the United States?"

"There are two things I think about it," said the Senator. "In the first place, the importance of the debts in the general economic relationships between Europe and the United States is greatly exaggerated. In the second place, the amount of so-called 'relief' that the United States at this moment is extending to Europe is far from sufficiently realized."

"Permit me to make notes on the first thing: The importance of the debts."

"Very well," said the Senator. "I will refer you to an authoritative source.

"The International Chamber of Commerce met here in Washington a few months ago. It had a lot of big reports presented to it by joint committees of Europeans and Americans. Among them was a report on the trade relationships between Europe and the United States. It dealt with payments by Europe to the United States and payments by the United States to Europe.

"We pay Europe for imported goods. We pay Europe for American freight and American passengers carried on European ships. We pay Europe large sums of cash in expenditures by American tourists in European countries. We pay Europe other large sums of cash in remittances to Europe by European immigrants now resident in the United States. We also pay Europe on European investments in the United States. And so on.

"Contrariwise, of course, Europe is each year paying us. Europe pays us for American goods imported into Europe. It pays us interest on American private investments in Europe. It pays us royalties on American films shown in Europe. And so on.

"Now note the conclusion of the committee of the International Chamber of Commerce on the exchanges of goods and services between Europe and our country. They say:

"'Payments under the debt settlements represent only about 5½ per cent of the total estimated annual payments due from Europe to the United States.'

"The same committee calculated the international 'world trade' of the European Continent at $35,000,000,000 in a normal year. The debt settlements are running at the rate now of along about $250,000,000 a year. We have to look at these things in their true proportions."

"But, Senator, you are talking about the European Continent as a whole. What about the individual cases of the individual debtor governments?"

"Well, take France. France owes us for the year 1932 the total sum of $50,000,000. The population of France is more than 40,000,000 persons. Call it 40,000,000. That's $1.25 for each of them to pay. We never have had any slightest shred of proof from the French Government to the effect that it couldn't be done."

"However, Senator, the general European situation might constitute an emergency and might indicate the desirability of American assistance."

"That's my second point. We hear nowadays about 'relief.' We hear about 'assistance.' I am not very strong for those words; but let's see what we've done lately in a financial way about Europe.

"Last summer our Federal reserve system extended a credit of $125,000,000 to the Bank of England and of $25,000,000 to the Central Bank of Germany. That's a total of $150,000,000.

"Almost simultaneously our private bankers lent $200,000,000 to the treasury of the British Government. That brings the total to $350,000,000.

"Our private bankers are additionally permitting German institutions and British institutions to retain some $600,000,000 of overdue short-term credits. That brings the total to $950,000,000.

"Then the United States Government this year is postponing the payments of the European governmental debts to the United States Government, and thus granting to those governments the use at this time of some $250,000,000. That brings the total to $1,200,000,000.

"But, further, we should include the debt payments which would have been due if we had not reduced the European governmental debts to us in the course of making the debt settlements. The reduction has been calculated by almost all responsible economists at approximately 50 per cent. If we were collecting the debts on the original promised basis, we would be getting this year not only the $250,000,000 which we have postponed but $250,000,000 more. We are letting Europe have that $250,000,000 for nothing. That brings our total of 'assistance' in Europe just now to $1,450,000,000.

"We also have put $75,000,000 this year of new money into Europe into long-term investments. That brings our total to $1,525,000,000.

"Finally, we have maintained a free gold market and Europe has been able to withdraw gold from the United States at will. That withdrawing has been done on a large scale. Europe took from us last summer some $700,000,000 of gold. She took it just as we got it—through trading and banking operations. We do not complain. Still, since we were charged with 'hoarding' it, we perhaps can legitimately observe that, instead of 'hoarding' it, we were engaged, even during our own immense depression and distress, in holding it instantly available to world demand. The $700,000,000 of gold that we thus supplied to Europe might accordingly be added to our total of present 'assistance' to Europe. It would bring that total to $2,225,000,000."

"They should be grateful. Or should they not?"

"They should not," responded the Senator with great emphasis. "I mean, we ought not to say that they should be and we ought not to expect that they will be. George Washington observed, after much experience in dealing with enemies and in dealing with allies in international affairs, that it is vain to expect gratitude from nation to nation. That observation remains accurate to-day, and there is no indication that it will ever cease to be accurate. No nation ever exhibits gratitude for loaning done to it or for fighting done on its behalf or for any other service. It would be wise if in international affairs we could get rid of such words as 'assistance' and 'generosity' and 'gratitude.' They do not correspond to any past, present, or prospective realities."

Thus the Senator, and his remarks are here presented not only because they come from a most distinguished political "regular" but because they represent the views, it would seem to-day, of a strong majority of all Senators and Representatives in the Congress, whether "regular" or "insurgent." The consequences in Europe, it is believed here, may be profound and immediate.

Europe, in the matter of debts, has been approaching us indirectly through publicists and propagandists. It may now approach us directly through notes from governments. It may now directly flatly say, "We can't pay." That seems likely to be the next era in the debt question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. HOWELL. I ask that the amendment may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Nebraska to ask for the immediate consideration of the amendment.

Mr. HOWELL. I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In accordance with the wish of the author of the amendment, it will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk, which I ask to have read, printed, and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be read, printed, and lie upon the table.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Oklahoma offers the following amendment: On page 2, line 1, after the words "payment of," to insert the words "80 per cent of," and on the same page, at the end of line 7, to strike out the period and add the words:

Provided, That the partial payment herein required shall be held as a special fund to be used for the relief of the unemployed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, for various reasons it had been my intention to go on to-morrow in the discussion of the pending joint resolution, but unfortunately I find the situation such that, without due preparation, I am compelled now to present in rather rambling fashion the views which are mine upon this matter.

Mr. President, there is one song which has been shudderingly heard all over the land during the last couple of years. It is a song with which Americans in business, who have had small competencies, those who felt that in the twilight of their lives they had the comforts so gratifying to declining years, never expected to hear, but the bankers all over the land in the last couple of years have sung again, again, and again to faltering Americans, "I am calling you." It has become so familiar with those whom I know and whom I love in the State of California that while they have responded to the dread tune "I am calling you" to-day nearly every one of the men with whom I have associated for 40 years or more, nearly every one, just a leap ahead of the sheriff, notwithstanding the tones spell ruin, is holding his head high, smiling as he goes on—smiling, yet facing in his later years, and in the end of his life, catastrophe and ruin. Never in our lives have our people in the same degree been required to face such disaster.

Mr. President, we had a mass disaster once in the city from which I come. We learned what it was to have a cataclysm that ruined nearly all our people. There was a singular and a strange psychological reflex we found in that mass disaster, a singular reflex, sir, that we find to-day in what has come in the matter of loss of property, of income, and of that for which men have struggled all during their lives.

In San Francisco, after the fire and the earthquake, when men and women whose homes were burned, when men who had little businesses that they had built up by a lifetime of industry and endeavor had seen those businesses go up in smoke and in the roar and in the dreadful fall of buildings we saw them marching along smiling, never whining, meeting mass disaster, meeting it in that spirit which is the spirit of the West, meeting it with never a bit of repining, but starting at once rebuilding for the future.

The only people who whined, the only people who cried, the only people who had little courage and slunk about prating of their losses were those who had $10,000,000 or $15,000,000, $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, $30,000,000 or $40,000,000, as the case might be, and found themselves after the disaster with only $5,000,000 or $6,000,000, $8,000,000, or $10,000,000. They did all the whining during that period.

I see the same psychological reflex in the United States to-day. I see those with whom I have had a lifetime of friendship and of affectionate intimacy, without repining, striving to build again in the few years that are left to them, but never whining, thanking God they have lived their lives and have had the little things that have made life comfortable, that have made life worth living, carrying on and looking forward to the end, looking forward to a different and more circumscribed life with their heads up and smiling. The only people who are crying and whining and howling and raising Cain to-day and endeavoring to justify themselves by prating of their own extraordinary acuteness and talents are those who may have had $100,000,000 or $200,000,000, $50,000,000 or $60,000,000, $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, and find themselves with only $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 left now upon which to subsist.

As I have listened to distinguished bankers who testified before the Finance Committee and as I heard their statements—statements uttered with a prescience of wisdom that it is impossible for me to describe, uttered when we sat at their feet to drink in their words as if they were inspired—I looked at those gentlemen and I thought that this day, this time, this hour, we are liquidating something else than the debts which Europe owes us. We liquidated at the treaty of Versailles the statesmanship of the world. The statesmanship of the world in the making of the treaty of Versailles showed itself to be absolutely bankrupt. It left us this horrid legacy which during the years since that treaty was executed has led to many difficulties, and that statesmanship of which we used to boast wrote for the world not a treaty of peace but an irritant for war.

Since October, 1929, we have been liquidating the wisdom and the omniscience of our great banking institutions and of those masters of finance who were supposed to be supermen before that time and who have been shown since that time to be very, very common clay.

We have been liquidating not only their unwisdom but we have demonstrated beyond the possibility of a doubt that those men who were thought to be financiers who by the slightest legerdemain could conjure up success and who could guide any movement wherein there were dollars were, after all, just as astute as we are and no more so, and we, some of us, belong to the debtor class still. They have demonstrated that there are no supermen financially in the United States; no supermen who could deal with great financial problems and solve them for a people.

To-day, realizing that we have liquidated our statesmanship in the treaty of Versailles and find it to be bankrupt, realizing that we are liquidating now the astuteness and the wisdom and the omniscience of our great financial giants, and finding them to be bankrupt, we may understand that we are dealing here with something that is not alone a sort of academic question respecting a moratorium, but we are dealing with something far more important affecting our future.

The reason I take the interest in this question that I do is not alone because of its immediate effect, not wholly because it has been entered into illegally and unconstitutionally, not solely because the resolution which is presented is upon its face a fraud, not entirely, sir, because it happens that this particular matter is a wrong and an injustice to the American people—although all of those reasons would be sufficient and ample to have any man of my views object to the resolution before us; but I am interested also in it because of the effect it will have upon the future, because, sir, to-day, or whenever this resolution shall be voted upon, we will determine in reality what is the future course of the United States in dealing financially with those countries across the seas.

For 15 years we have been departing from the old doctrine and the old tradition of the American Republic. For 12 years we have been departing from the doctrine of the Republican Party that gave it success and power in the United States. For 12 to 15 years we have been bending our eyes, not to our own and not to America, but we have been looking beyond the sea; and we have our lesson now. We have before us the effects of that which we have done and we understand that dealing as we have with the nations across the sea redounds only to the detriment of America and in loss to American citizens. If we do nothing else than to arouse our people in this contest, arousing them so they may return to the old traditional policy that was ours before our drunken European orgy, we will have served a very useful purpose and our effort will not have been wholly in vain.

Mr. President, the peculiar situation which presents itself to us now is one that I have seldom seen in the Senate. To-day we stand here with another branch of the Government shaking in the faces of the Members of the United States Senate their pledges—68 in number, says a representative of the administration. Sixty-eight in number have signed upon the dotted line "and we have no doubt," says he, "of the result in this body." That may be true. I do not know and I do not care. The only thing I do know—and that relates to me alone, just as your attitude and what you have done relates to you alone—is that I have done no such thing. I neither criticize nor do I indulge in animadversions concerning what you have done. I only know that one man would not sign his name upon the dotted line on the 20th day of June, 1931, and pledge himself concerning something about which he knew nothing and then continue to believe that he was bound by a pledge that was not consummated in fact and the consummation of which was of something very different from that to which he pledged himself. I propose first to demonstrate to this body, so there may be no mistake upon that subject, exactly what has transpired, exactly what the original pledge was that was made by those 68 in number who signed the original agreement to carry out the President's wish.

It was the fateful 20th day of June that our leaders met in the White House in secret session with the President of the United States—not the Congress of the United States, not you nor you nor you nor me, but your leaders and mine—not the men that were chosen in the districts that were far away, but the men who were the leaders of the Democratic Party, of the Republican Party, and forsooth of the Progressive wing of the Republican Party. Those leaders, meeting on the 20th day of June, 1931, agreed with the President of the United States upon a specific and a particular course. What was it? What was it, I ask you? Let us see as we progress whether those who then met agreed to what was ultimately consummated by the President, and let us see whether what is written in this resolution is what those leaders of ours agreed upon on June 20, 1931, at that fateful meeting at the White House.

On the 20th day of June, 1931, the President gave forth this statement:

> The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments of intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, both principal and interest, of course not including obligations of governments held by private parties.

Of course I recognize that the Government could not violate the contracts of private parties, but the thought has ever been present with me: If you are to take from all the people of this land that which is theirs, at least in precatory fashion you might invite a few of the people of this land who had their private obligations to forego them as well. But that is not our system to-day, Mr. President, and so nothing of the sort was attempted.

> Subject to confirmation by Congress, the American Government will postpone all payments upon the debts of foreign governments to the American Government payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1, next, conditional on a like postponement for one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts owing the important creditor powers.

There is not any mistake as to the English of this paragraph. Indeed there is not any mistake as to the intention of the parties when this document was given forth to the people of this land and to those of other lands as well. It is perfectly obvious, sir, that the intent of those who then agreed was to agree, as the statement reads, that payment on all intergovernmental debts should be postponed for a period of a year, and that that postponement should relate to every kind of intergovernmental debt among any of the parties.

> The purpose of this action—

This particular statement proceeds—

> is to give the forthcoming year to the economic recovery of the world and to help free the recuperative forces already in motion in the United States from retarding influences from abroad.

How we Americans love phrases, do we not? How we love to mouth certain phrases, and then having mouthed those phrases, reap our reward in the moronic applause of those who listen to us. To-day any man may be a wise statesman if he simply weeps tears that are big enough and cries that he is for peace, as if everybody did not want peace! To-day any man may be a great statesman if he stands up and, with his fist raised, yells in stentorian tones, "I demand economy," as if any man in office ever dared preach extravagance! To-day if we do certain other things of like character, and mouth certain other phrases, how great we are; and how our audiences say, as they listen to us and as they weep with us, "What a marvelous statesman is this; he is for peace and he is for economy"; and when you have convinced your audience that you are for peace and for economy, then your way is smooth. Do not ever roughen it, sir. Let me give to my younger friends who are upon this side and the younger Members of this body on the other side a little advice: Do not roughen the way by any independence, by any thought of your people, by standing, if need be, alone in behalf of your own, and fighting for them. Do not do it; the other is the easier path. It is the path of preferment. Mediocrity never yet was able to reach political preferment except by these common and these easy paths, by persistent and conventional regularity. So beware, my friends; beware of stepping across the line and getting upon the rougher road, the road of independence. A glorious road it is, even if you walk it alone; it is a glorious thing to have walked your whole life along that rough path, and walked it just as God gave you the light to see and to walk it, fearing no man, no matter where he is, and no party, whatever that party may be. It is a glorious thing; and if you can write as the epitaph of any man who has been in public life, "He walked the road of independence and dared to do what he thought was right when all his fellows were against him," then you have written for him an epitaph that is more glorious than all the epitaphs that could be carved by the most renowned of artistic genius. So walk the easy path, and go not down this rougher road, my friends who are new in this game and new in our political life. Walk the easy way, and it will be a splendid thing, because you will have little or no political difficulties.

We read in this communication that—

> The purpose of this action is to give the forthcoming year to the economic recovery of the world.

It sounds as if somebody were writing satire, does it not?

> And to help free the recuperative forces already in motion in the United States from retarding influences from abroad.

"Recuperative forces" in the United States! What are these "recuperative forces" in the United States? I know what they are. I have felt them during the nine months I have been in that city from which I come and which I love. I have seen these recuperative forces, with every bank there calling loans and every man who had a bit of collateral being sold out and sent out to begin life all over again. I have seen these "recuperative forces" for the past six months, and I know and you know, Mr. President, that, although this letter was written on the 20th day of last June, Germany is to-day in a worse condition than Germany then was.

However, sir, let me proceed with this affecting communication to which so many of our brethren gave their acquiescence and consent:

> The world-wide depression has affected the countries of Europe more severely than our own.

I deny it. I recognize all that has happened over in Europe; I recognize the difference relatively in conditions which exist there and which exist here, but I deny that they are in any worse fix than are we. Our farmers can not pay the mortgages upon their farms; their homes are being daily taken from them. Our merchants can scarcely keep their businesses alive. We have a deficit that is appalling and taxes are sought to be enacted more severe than any ever levied in peace time. Our people, to the number of 7,000,000, are walking the streets; there is to-day the tramp, tramp, tramp of men begging for work.

Conditions in this country are such that we hear with little patience we are so much better off than is Europe, and, then using this as a predicate that we are better off than Europe, who can blame our people, so sorely pressed, for resenting the effort of their Government, soon to be successful, alas, to take from them $250,000,000 belonging to them and give it to Europe.

The fabric of intergovernmental debts—

supportable in normal times, weighs heavily in the midst of this depression.

From a variety of causes arising out of the depression, such as the fall in the price of foreign commodities and the lack of confidence in economic and political stability abroad, there is an abnormal movement of gold into the United States which is lowering the credit stability of many foreign countries. These and the other difficulties abroad diminish buying power for our exports and, in a measure, are the cause of our continued unemployment and continued lower prices to our farmers.

Oh, you Senators who represent the farming districts, who know conditions there, who have been out in the Dakotas, in Nebraska, in Iowa, in Minnesota, and in other States where farmers have found themselves not only depressed but ruined, note with sympathetic interest the statement here concerning the lower prices the farmers have received because of the debts due to us from Europe. Take your comfort out of it, because the implication is plain—relieve Europe of her debts and immediately the farmers of the United States will have increased prices and again prosperity will be theirs.

The statement proceeds—

Wise and timely action action should contribute to relieve the pressure of these adverse forces in foreign countries and should assist in the reestablishment of confidence, thus forwarding political peace and economic stability in the world.

Authority of the President to deal with this problem is limited, as this action must be supported by the Congress. It has been assured the cordial support of leading Members of both parties in the Senate and the House.

Abolish the Senate! If we stand by this sort of thing in the matter of legislation, why do we need a representative body at all? Who cares what a representative body shall do if certain leaders may be taken into the White House in secrecy any night of the year, and upon their ipse dixit legislation shall be predicated and legislation passed? Why have a legislative body? Why not abolish it? I know many good people in this country who believe in a dictatorship, who insist that what we need now at the helm is one of the strongest of humankind, who will have the power of disposition not only of men's lives but of their property. I recognize there are many of that sort. From them I dissent, but this is the sort of thing that makes dictatorships, and this is the sort of thing that arouses revolution.

Look at your history, Mr. President, and study it. Go back and see what happened in the great World War. See then statesmanship at Paris bankrupt in the formulation of the treaty of Versailles. See now the great captains of finance finally stripped bare until they show themselves of little or no consequence. These are the symptoms that always precede upheavals of peoples; and you may look forward in the near or far future, if things do not change in some degree, to some of the upheavals with which history teems, among ourselves.

Recently we saw a peculiar sort of "hunger strike" with which you, Mr. President, and others of us probably had little sympathy, marching down to the Capitol. The significance of that march was not in those men and those women who were out in the Capitol grounds; the significance of it was that there was any such thing at all in a free government. It was not a pretty sight; and not only was it not a pretty sight but it was not a healthy sight.

I resume reading further from this marvelous document:

Wise and timely action should contribute to relieve the pressure of these adverse forces in foreign countries and should assist in the reestablishment of confidence, thus forwarding political peace and economic stability in the world.

Authority of the President to deal with this problem is limited, as this action must be supported by the Congress. It has been assured the cordial support of leading Members of both parties in the Senate and the House.

Perhaps he should have said "three parties."

The essence of this proposition is to give time to permit debtor governments to recover their national prosperity.

"Debtor governments to recover their national prosperity!"

What debtor governments? Not France, because France sits upon the top of the world to-day; not Britain, because Britain, with the dogged persistence which she has, and which is her most admirable trait, is fighting her own battle and is asking no odds at all; not the eight countries that have nothing to do with Germany or with reparations but which, for good measure, were included in this bill—not them I am sure. So it is only Germany to which he refers, and as to her the events of the past six months have shown us that the moratorium is worth literally nothing.

I wish to take this occasion also to frankly state my views upon our relations to German reparations and the debts owed to us by the allied governments of Europe. Our Government has not been a party to, or exerted any voice in determination of reparation obligations. We purposely did not participate in either general reparations or the division of colonies or property. The repayment of debts due to us from the Allies for the advance for war and reconstruction was settled upon a basis not contingent upon German reparations or related thereto. Therefore, reparations is necessarily wholly a European problem with which we have no relation.

That, my friends, is, to say the least, an unwittingly disingenuous statement. It is perfectly absurd; and men who have heads upon their shoulders that the Lord put there for some other purpose than mere ornament can understand that when we deal with German reparations and say that those reparations shall not be paid to France in return for our forgiving France a debt, why, of course, so inextricably commingled are reparations and debts that we never can unravel them; and after this moratorium it is perfect nonsense to say that reparations and debts have no connection whatsoever. We gave them a connection when we subscribed to the moratorium, and we gave them such an intimate connection that the doctrine we have so long proclaimed is set wholly at naught.

And then follow these words:

I do not approve in any remote sense of the cancellation of the debts to us.

I am coming to that in a moment, when I take up the message.

World confidence would not be enhanced by such action.

"World confidence would not be enhanced by such action!"

None of our debtor nations have ever suggested it.

I can not fathom what is meant by a statement of that sort, when there is not a responsible statesman in Europe to-day who has not publicly declared in favor of cancellation of the indebtedness that is due to our country. I have at some place here—and before I conclude I will read them—the very few remarks that were made by Ramsay MacDonald when he spoke to his constituency at Seaham during his campaign, in which he said, in substance, "The moratorium now ends forever the debts that are due to the United States."

The President says:

But as the basis of the settlement of these debts was the capacity under normal conditions of the debtor to pay, we should be consistent with our own policies and principles if we take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world. I am sure the American people have no desire to attempt to extract any sum beyond the capacity of any debtor to pay, and it is our view that broad vision requires that our Government should recognize the situation as it exists.

If that is not a brief for scaling down debts, I am unable to understand the English language. If it is not a statement in so many words that we should stop and consider and do what is essential in the matter of scaling debts, it has no meaning at all and no place in this document. Here it is, as plain as plain can be, what was in the mind of the writer of this particular statement, and it is perfectly plain to-day what is in the minds of those in power in this Government who are demanding of us this moratorium.

This course of action—

He says—

is entirely consistent with the policy which we have hitherto pursued. We are not involved in the discussion of strictly European problems, of which the payment of German reparations is one. It represents our willingness to make a contribution to the early restoration of world prosperity in which our own people have so deep an interest.

I wish further to add that while this action has no bearing on the conference for limitation of land armaments to be held next February, inasmuch as the burden of competitive armaments has contributed to bring about this depression, we trust that by this evidence of our desire to assist we shall have contributed to the good will which is so necessary in the solution of this major question.

I have read this statement of the President of June 20 last because it is necessary to a full understanding of what has transpired and what has been done; to a full understanding of this peculiar joint resolution which has been presented; and it is necessary, too, in order that intelligently we may act upon this question which thus comes before us.

You have heard here to-day discussed upon this floor the necessity for haste, and how it was absolutely essential, absolutely necessary, that we should pass immediately this particular moratorium. So necessary was it that the Finance Committee met and reported what came from the House before it ever had it; and the message from the House came over here while the report from the Senate Finance Committee was in the hands of the chairman, ready to present. I complain not of that mode of doing business; but haste is so necessary! This was only Saturday last—do you realize that, just Saturday last, the very last legislative day?—when this thing was reported; and then on Monday it is absolutely necessary that we sit here all night, if we can believe these gentlemen—sit here all night, and then vote in the early hours of the morning upon this moratorium. "Haste! Haste! Haste!" they say.

I will tell you why they want so much haste. Now, over in Switzerland the representative of the United States is sitting there with the representatives of three neutral countries and those of France, Germany, and Great Britain. They are determining over there what ought to be done in the future. Already, from the press dispatches, they have decided that two years more moratorium must be granted. Already, according to the press, they have determined it; and these gentlemen do not want this discussion of their moratorium here when that report becomes public, and do not wish you to know you are up against two years more of moratorium or scaling down these debts. That is the haste.

Haste? Haste? Why haste when six months have elapsed since the moratorium substantially was declared? Mind you, the dates:

June 20, 1931, the moratorium was practically declared, when our leaders met—the leaders of the Republican Party, the leaders of the Democratic Party, the leaders of the Progressive Party—when they all met and determined that they would agree to a moratorium, a moratorium of all intergovernmental debts. That was June 20. The haste was so necessary then that it was impossible to follow the Constitution, and it was utterly impossible to have the orderly processes of our Government and the spirit of our laws followed, so that we could act upon it in Congress. Haste! Haste! And what happened then?

Immediately the matter was taken up with France. Haste, you say? So much haste that you could not call the Congress of the United States in session; and yet the Government of the United States dickered with the Government of France from the 20th day of June to the 6th day of July, a period of 16 days!

Why, within four days after this moratorium was given to the world Congress could have been called in session, and would have acted. It could then have determined exactly what it would do; but mind you, now, the fact: France would not agree that all intergovernmental debts should be accorded a moratorium. Get that in your minds, please, you gentlemen who constitute the brave galaxy of 68 that Mr. Mills prates about and shakes in the faces of the House and in the faces of the Members of the Senate. Remember June 20–July 6. France would not consent; she declined absolutely and unequivocally to consent to the moratorium that was proposed by Mr. Hoover; and then what happened?

Then the United States Government and France practically entered into a treaty. It was an agreement in writing concerning the moratorium. They entered into an agreement in writing. After you had agreed to one kind of moratorium, France and Mr. Hoover agreed to another kind.

How many of you were advised who signed as the 68—how many of you were told, after you had sent back your wire and said that you would agree to the moratorium—how many of you were told, "This is held up by France, and the moratorium that we are about to agree to is a different thing from the moratorium you consented to by telegram"? How many? Who knew it?

Maybe our leaders knew it. I do not know. Maybe our leaders were called into another conference at the White House and told. But we, sir, who have not reached yet the stature of leadership; we, sir, who constitute only the hoi polloi of the Congress of the United States—none of us was notified at all; and none of us knew, and I doubt if even our leaders knew, that France entered into an entirely different arrangement from that which we were told was entered into and that to which you assented.

What was it that France agreed to?

The following is the text of the agreement reached by American and French negotiators at Paris, France, June 6, 1931.

You could not call the Congress of the United States in session, though you had 16 days, my friends. You could not do that. "The representatives of the people of the United States be damned! We do not need them. They will not be called in consultation in this matter"; but for 16 days the Government of the United States permitted France to determine what should be done and finally agreed to France's terms.

Upon what theory, upon what rational conception of official duty, is it that you may take 16 days to deal with France, and you can deal with the United States Senate only by a Western Union Telegraph blank? Upon what theory is it that France may alter as she sees fit a moratorium to which you agree, and you—you, you, just Senators of the United States who are not leaders—shall not be consulted at all, and this in the very teeth of the Constitution of the United States, that gives the power and indeed makes it the duty of the President of the United States in emergency or crisis to call the Congress together?

But France and the United States agreed after an exchange of views:

The French Government states that it is in agreement with the United States on the essential principle of President Hoover's proposal and on the following propositions, which may be expressed thus.

I do not know whether you gentlemen remember all that we used to hear about diplomatic exchanges. I recall during the great arms conference here in Washington how whenever a foreign nation desired to express itself with such ambiguity that it could do anything in the future it would say that it agreed "in principle" with what was advanced and would subsequently fix the details.

Always the language of diplomacy is, "We believe in principle with what is suggested, but we will agree on the details hereafter." So France agreed in principle with what was suggested by the American Government.

But on the following proposition, which may be expressed thus—I am reading the text of the agreement now—

The payment of intergovernmental debts is postponed from July 1, 1931, to June 30, 1932.

There is a perfectly plain statement. None can misunderstand it.

2. However, the Reich—

That is, the German Government—will pay the amount of the unconditional annuity. The French Government agrees, in so far as it is concerned, that the payments thus made by the Reich shall be placed in the B. I. S.—

That is, the Bank for International Settlements—in guaranteed bonds by the German railways.

3. All suspended payments shall be subject to interest in accordance with the conditions suggested by the American Government.

There are two kinds of reparations which are received by France. I take it all Senators know these facts. One class is called conditional reparations. Senators have the Young plan, I presume, and from it they can see the details, and, following me, tell whether or not I am accurate in what I say. The others are called the unconditional payments.

France stipulated—not that all intergovernmental debts should have a moratorium—but France stipulated, "You have to pay the unconditional reparations." It is true France said, "We will deposit them in the Bank for International Settlements, and we will lend them to your railroad, but upon the security of your railroad backed by your Government." That was the moratorium to which France agreed. France was thus made a preferred creditor. That was a very different thing from what originally was proposed.

Do not Senators recall, or are our memories exhausted by a short six months, all that was said during the time after June 20, when the Government of the United States was dickering with the Government of France? Can you not remember when the administration was asking the Government of France to join in the moratorium and our Government expressed its displeasure that it did not do it? Again and again we saw the items published as to how all the psychological effect of the moratorium was being lost by France's action and France was preventing the recovery of the world.

Finally, the administration had to accept in order to get anything, and in order to justify our 68 subscribers of the 20th of June they had to agree to France's terms and let France take the unconditional reparations.

Mind you, now, that is not all. It was in August that the rest of the nations met and met over in London. I have forgotten the date, but I think it was August 4, although it may have been a little later than that. They all agreed to the "protocol" which existed between the United States and France in relation to the moratorium.

Just think of the position we are in here in Congress. Here was a moratorium concerning which Congress should have been consulted. No one denies that, so far as I am able to understand. There was ample time to call the Congress in special session and have the Congress act. No man denies that, so far as I know. Then there was substantially a treaty entered into between France and the United States concerning the moratorium and concerning the reparations to be paid by Germany. Nobody denies that. Then the nations of the earth which were interested met in London and they subscribed to the protocol which was executed between France and the United States, all this being done upon the faith, we are assured, of various telegrams which had been sent by Members of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives agreeing to a moratorium expressed as of June 20, relating to all intergovernmental debts, and a moratorium was finally agreed to July 6 by the administration and France which was of vastly different character from that which had been stated on June 20.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. Can the Senator from California inform me as to whether the 68 Senators agreed to a moratorium "in principle" or to the details?

Mr. JOHNSON. If they possessed the diplomatic skill which I think is possessed by some of my brethren here—and I say that in complimentary fashion—they would have agreed in principle and not in detail. But it is assumed that they agreed in detail; and assuming that they agreed in detail, the moratorium has gone on.

Mr. President, now I am going to move that we adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow. It will take me about an hour to conclude.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, would the Senator agree to a unanimous consent that the Senate——

Mr. JOHNSON. I can not agree to unanimous consent. I have said to those who were interested in this matter that this debate was going on legitimately. It will be concluded, in my opinion, to-morrow or the following day; but I can not do more than express an opinion, and I can not agree to a particular hour.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not 5 o'clock yet.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is 10 minutes to 5, and I move that we adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that motion for a moment, until we inquire whether there is anybody else who wants to talk this afternoon?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not want to speak this afternoon; I am not prepared to at this time; but I do want to address the Senate to-morrow for a short time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It does seem that gentlemen who want to speak upon this matter ought to be prepared. As far as I am concerned, I would like very much to accommodate the Senator from California, who has been talking now for quite a while, but if the Senator is not prepared to go on, I should think that somebody who wants to speak upon this subject could take the floor, for a while, at least.

Mr. JOHNSON. If it is necessary, I will go on; but I say to the Senator from Montana: No; I ask no favors. If I have to go on, I will go on; but I would like to have the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to ask the Senator how many Senators are going to speak.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think but three; but I do not know. I made no effort to ascertain until after lunch to-day. I think there are three or four on this side who are going to speak, and then the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is going to speak.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Would the Senator mind amending his motion to have the Senate meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not care; I would not object to that.

Mr. COUZENS. That will be just as good as going on another hour now; in fact, it would be better.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to see whether the Senator from California would not agree to voting on the joint resolution before 12 o'clock to-morrow night.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will not; I can not. I will take my medicine, if that entails going ahead. It does not make any difference. I will go on if I have to, although I do not want to go on at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. JOHNSON. I moved that we adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow. Does the Senator from Michigan ask me to make it 11 o'clock?

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to have the Senator make it 11 o'clock. I think that would be better than going on an hour now.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am ready to make it 11 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will not the Senator withhold his motion just a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from California says he has no desire unduly to prolong the debate. He says there are only three or four more to speak in opposition to the joint resolution, and I do not think there will be many speakers for the proposal. It seems that if we should meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock, we ought to be able to get through with the matter to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. I was just going to suggest to the Senator from California that we meet at 10 o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON. Please make it 11 o'clock. Eleven o'clock is early enough.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from California withhold his motion so the Senator from Oregon can made a statement?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. I was going to suggest that if we are about to conclude the session to-day, we take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, rather than adjourn, in order to save the morning hour.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to amending the motion I have made so as to move that we take a recess.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have some understanding in relation to to-morrow. The Senator would not want to adjourn to-morrow about 5 o'clock or 6 o'clock, would he?

Mr. JOHNSON. It would depend on what happened in the debate. I am not prepared to say what will happen. I am not able to answer for all the Senators opposed to this measure. My own opinion is that we will get through to-morrow, or the following day, at the very latest. But that is a mere opinion of mine, and I do not want to be bound to a guaranty. This debate is going on all right.

Just think of what we have here when this is asked by the Senator from Utah. We have here, in a matter which involves $250,000,000, a statement by the Finance Committee of three minutes' duration; that is all. They dare not argue this matter before the Senate. They make a statement of three minutes, and then, because we are arguing here—and there is not a word I have said that is not pertinent to what is before the Senate—they want to cram us and jam us, when the debate is proceeding and will proceed and be speedily concluded.

It is an outrageous situation. There is only one character of thing in which you can do that in the Senate, and that is for a foreign nation. You can not do it for an American or for Americans. The only ones for whom you can do it are foreigners and foreign nations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, am I right in assuming that the pending question is a motion to recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I assume we are now in general accord that we will recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow. So I shall make a motion to that effect, but before that I want a short executive session. I move now that we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, earlier in the day I made a report for the Executive Calendar from the Interstate Commerce Committee on the reappointment of two Interstate Commerce Commissioners. With the probability that we shall not have another executive session before we adjourn for the holidays, I ask unanimous consent that these nominations be confirmed at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let them be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of William E. Lee, of Idaho, to be an Interstate Commerce Commissioner for the term expiring December 31, 1938.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Balthasar H. Meyer, of Wisconsin, to be an Interstate Commerce Commissioner for the term expiring December 31, 1938.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator whether he understands the attitude of my colleague [Mr. DILL] with reference to these confirmations?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; the Senator's colleague was at the committee meeting which passed on them.

Mr. JONES. Did he agree that they might be called up without going to the calendar? He has always insisted heretofore upon such nominations going to the calendar for at least one day.

Mr. COUZENS. The emergency of the case was understood, that their term of office expires at the end of the year, and if we do not have another executive session before we adjourn and they are not confirmed they could not hold office until after the first of the year.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

JOHN WILLIAMS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of John Williams, of California, to be a member of the Board of Mediation for a term expiring five years after January 1, 1932.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed. That completes the calendar.

SAMUEL PURVIS

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, from the Committee on the Judiciary, I report back favorably the nomination which I send to the desk, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the nomination be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Samuel Purvis, of Georgia, to be United States marshal, middle district of Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask for the immediate confirmation of the nomination.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have no objection myself, but my colleage Mr. DILL has always insisted on these nominations going to the calendar for one day unless there was some special reason to the contrary. Would the Senator have any objection to letting this go over until to-morrow?

Mr. GEORGE. I have no objection if we are to have an executive session to-morrow.

Mr. JONES. We can certainly have an executive session to-morrow.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I am informed that unless we have unanimous consent to notify the President of the confirmation of the nominations to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Board of Mediation, those gentlemen whose nominations were to-day confirmed can not hold office until after two executive sessions shall have been held.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan is correct.

Mr. COUZENS. I ask unanimous consent, then, that the President be notified of those confirmations.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold that request just a moment——

Mr. COUZENS. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. I wish to move that all confirmations made on the 17th and 18th and to-day be released and the President be notified. That will cover them all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The order includes the confirmations of to-day. The President will be notified. The Senate resumes legislative session.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 22, 1931, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1931

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Glory to Thee, O Lord, most high—we praise Thee for the anticipation of Him who increases the sum of human joy and happiness. We are now in the foreglow of that day when the sound of the market will die out in the street and men will strike the truce of battle. Yes; He is coming again. The One who smiled at the lure of riches and the embarrassment of penury. At His gentle footfall the citadels of iniquity trembled, and as He passed by He endowed the meanest thing with interest and beauty. Oh bless us, Lord God, with an impulse of a new love—to be a friend to the friendless, a benefactor to the homeless, and a refuge to those who are smitten. Let us forget past wrongs and mistakes and bless us with the golden glow of a generous mind, with the healing love of a big heart, and with the bracing energy of a courageous spirit. May we live for men for whom he died and pledge ourselves to labor for a justice-loving, a freedom-loving, and a warless world. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, December 19, 1931, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1357. An act for the relief of Nancy H. Rouse, Clara H. Simmons, W. H. Hays, Hallie H. Hamilton, and Bradford P. Hays.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 142) entitled "Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for the Employment Service, Department of Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932."

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. SMOOT and Mr. HARRISON members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

COL. ANDREW SUMMERS ROWAN

Mr. SHOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an address I made at the dedication of a bridge which was named in honor of the man who carried the message to Garcia, Col. Andrew Summers Rowan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHOTT. Mr. Speaker, I feel that the great service rendered the Nation in the Spanish-American War by Col. Andrew Summers Rowan, a native of the district I have the honor to represent, makes the tribute accorded him on Thursday, October 29, 1931, when many thousand Virginians and West Virginians met on New River and dedicated a bridge which was named in honor of the man who carried the message to Garcia, worthy of a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I am therefore, under permission given me to extend my remarks, inserting an address I made on the first public remembrance occasion recognizing the heroism and fidelity to duty of this famous son of West Virginia and soldier of the Republic.

The address is as follows:

One of the most outstanding spiritual incidents of our civilization is the grateful remembrance of those who strive, suffer, and sacrifice for the good of their fellow countrymen and humanity. The spirit that embalms the heroes of war and peace time in the hearts of men and women urges that some undying embodiment of their homage be placed so that physical vision may ponder and remembrance be kept alive for the generations that are to come after, and so it is that men's hands raise memorials of imperishable bronze and marble that the tooth of time may be stayed and veneration and thanksgiving endure through the dissolving years.

Monuments and obelisks and spires, mute in their lonely and solemn grandeur, may impress, but the great utility we call a bridge is the most fitting of all objects of remembrance and emblems of honor, because in its usefulness it bears the burden of commerce and communication of States and neighborhoods, and lifts the feet of countless men and women from the muck and mire of swamp and stream, makes easy the way of those who must cross, and fulfills man's highest hope—passing safely over the pitfalls and obstacles that lie before him in every path he uses in the journey of life.

From early time down to the last war, bridges and roads have been the most important facilities in the struggle of nations, and their control the high point in the peace conferences of the world.

It is fitting, then, that these graceful spans that bridge this great mountain stream should be dedicated in honor of a man born and reared among the neighboring hills, and who in a crisis of our national life distinguished himself by bravery and fidelity to duty, the story of which has been told 'round the world in every tongue, to inspire in men and youths those higher obligations of citizenship that are the most glorious and enduring adornment of mankind.

The great bridge we dedicate to public usefulness to-day and name in honor of Col. Andrew Summers Rowan, a native of the hills overlooking the winding course of New River, is the connecting link between Virginia and West Virginia in a section where the two States border on this swiftly flowing mountain stream, in which is the unharnessed power to drive the factories and light the homes of a State.

The completion of the splendid highway and linking its two great stretches of many miles by the construction of this bridge had long been a dream of the Virginias and its consummation the sunrise of a great new day in our local development.

I congratulate the people of the two States and extend through Lieut. Gov. James Price, officially representing Virginia, the thanks of the people of the section to the Old Dominion and its officials, and through Senator George E. White, the official representative of the Mountain State, the thanks of all who live amid the West Virginia hills.

We of West Virginia claim a heritage in the history and an enduring heirship in the traditions of the mother State, of which we are proud. The people of West Augusta contributed to the glorious history of colony and commonwealth, and the names and deeds of mountain men are spread side by side with those of the eastern section across the flaming pages of the country's early history. Washington, when the men of the eastern seaboard colonies who made up the soldiery of his patriot army, were discouraged and almost ready to give up, heard that the mountain mothers of West Virginia were sending their young sons to join their fathers in the battles for liberty, said:

"Leave me but a banner to plant on the mountains of Augusta, and I will rally around me the men who will lift our bleeding country from the dust, and set her free."

The man we honor to-day by giving his name to this bridge is as near as one man may be a citizen of both Virginias. Born in Monroe County when it was Virginia, he spent his early life in the same county after it became a part of West Virginia, and both States may claim him as a son, just as both share to-day in doing him honor. Like a tale of thrilling fiction reads the story of how Lieut. Andrew Summers Rowan, a young geographical expert of the United States Army, disguised himself as a British hunter and carried a message from President McKinley to Gen. Calixte Garcia, a Cuban rebel leader upon whom the United States depended for aid at the outbreak of the Spanish-American War. His daring feat inspired Elbert Hubbard to write his famous Message to Garcia, which first appeared in 1899, and which has had a phenomenal circulation throughout the two hemispheres. A Message to Garcia has been translated into every written language and more than 40,000,000 copies have been printed, which is said to be the largest circulation of any literary production attained during the lifetime of its author.

Colonel Rowan was born in 1858 at Gap Mills, Monroe County, being the son of John M. Rowan, who settled in that county in 1844 and who was treasurer of West Virginia from 1892 to 1896.

Young Rowan entered the Naval Academy at Annapolis about 1874, but after three years at the institution he resigned and through Senator Frank Hereford secured an appointment to the United States Military Academy at West Point. Graduating from West Point in 1881 Rowan was commissioned a second lieutenant in the Fifteenth United States Infantry and for several years saw service on the western frontier. He was then detailed to survey duty in Central America, where he acquired a fluent knowledge of Spanish. It was this familiarity with that language, his sagacity, and his skill in map drawing that led to his selection by the Bureau of Military Information to carry a message from our Government to General Garcia, the leader of the Cuban insurgents.

When all efforts to arbitrate the differences with Spain had failed and it became only a matter of days until war would be declared, the United States realized that it had little, if any, authentic information regarding the Spanish forces in Cuba.

General Garcia, who had long urged the Cubans to rise against the Spanish authorities, then governing the island with a high hand, was decided upon as the one man who could supply the necessary information, but, as he was hidden deep in the mountains of the interior, it was doubtful if he would learn until too late that hostilities were impending.

Rowan in the meantime had been sent to Kingston, Jamaica, in preparation for the dash. Late one night a coded cable message from Washington instructing him to "join Garcia as soon as possible" started him through the enemy lines on the perilous expedition, which Rowan, as well as everyone familiar with the conditions, believed would end in his death.

Procuring the regalia of a British hunter and small sailboat, he crossed to Cuba under cover of the inky darkness and entered the Spanish patrol lines just before dawn. Eluding the first outpost, he was soon on the edge of the thick, jungle-like wilds through which he was to travel on foot for a week.

Under hardships which later caused even the most calloused Army scouts to wonder how he survived, Rowan continued breaking through the tropical growth and making his way across the treacherous Sierra Maestra Mountains, and on May 1, 1898, reached Garcia with his message later immortalized by Elbert Hubbard.

The rebel general upon learning that the United States was at war with Spain and desired his cooperation not only supplied Rowan with all the military information at his command but selected three of his most trusted officers to make the dangerous trip back to Washington to help the American authorities prepare their campaign.

Rowan was asked if he could start back the same night, and upon his reply that he would not be satisfied to do anything else the four left Bayamo, where Garcia was hidden, and a few minutes later were swimming the Cauto River a short distance above the Spanish post.

They made their way to the coast, obtained a small boat, and after passing under the Spanish guns late at night proceeded to Nassau. One of the rebel officers selected by General Garcia to accompany Rowan had to remain on the Cuban shore, as there was no room in the boat for him.

From Nassau the three hurried to Washington, where President McKinley and Secretary of War Alger extended public congratulations to the young lieutenant who had braved death countless times in carrying out his official orders.

Rowan was promoted to a captaincy shortly after his return, but it was more than 24 years before Congress recognized his valor and voted him a distinguished-service cross with a silver-star citation.

After the cessation of hostilities in Cuba the man who carried the message to Garcia was transferred to the Philippines, where he saw much active service. Subsequently Rowan was promoted to the rank of major, and a few years later to that of lieutenant colonel, which rank he held when he resigned from the Army in 1909 because of his health.

So, today, in the name of both Virginias we pay tribute to him, because under the urge of patriotism and a high devotion to duty as an American and a soldier of the Republic, he carried a message; and we rejoice that under the charm of remembrance, appreciation, and love for his native home, friends, and kindred, he has sent a message because his infirmities of age hold him reluctantly from attendance on this occasion. The message of Colonel Rowan, which he has asked me to read to you, is as follows:

"To my old and new friends, greetings; I was born in Virginia, but with the division of the State I found that I belonged to both sections. So I seem to be a sort of connecting link between the two, as this vast structure flung across New River once more connects them. I am honored by the request to send you a message and deeply regret that I can not be with you on this auspicious occasion.

"As a native son of the two Virginias (born in Old Virginia and reared in West Virginia) permit me to add my enthusiastic plaudits at the dedication of the steel bridge connecting the two States across New River, near the scene of my birth and childhood.

"The New River, 900 miles long, a succession of pools, cauldrons, and rapids, which erodes its way through three States, where its babbling echo mocks the hounds and bids defiance to all who would try, with 'thus far and no further,' has at last received its answer in this beautiful and enduring structure, a landmark on the new highway.

"To one who has been trained as a soldier nothing speaks louder in the interest of preparedness than a system of well-devised and well-built highways. So in building the great system of interstate routes the States may be building better than they know. The Romans knew their roads.

"I wish to thank you all for the interest you have taken in my career, which has sustained me in many trying hours and on far-distant fields.

"This is my handclasp across the continent to all the loyal sons and daughters of the two Virginias.

"ANDREW SUMMERS ROWAN."

Elbert Hubbard, whose story of the man who "carried the message to Garcia," immortalized Colonel Rowan, gave up his life in the tragedy of the Lusitania. The inspiration for the famous article came from his son, Elbert Hubbard, 2d, who sends the following message:

"I regret that I am unable to be with you, much as I would like to. I think it is very splendid of you to dedicate your bridge in honor of Colonel Rowan. He bridged the gap between President McKinley and General Garcia, thus rendering a great service. You are now bridging the gap between your various countrysides, thus making history and bringing neighbors closer together. My congratulations to you and all the folk in your neck of the woods."

In the lifetime of Colonel Rowan, the Nation has grown from 30,000,000 population to 125,000,000; its territory has increased 626,000,000 square miles; its national wealth increased from $30,000,000,000 to $500,000,000,000; it has seen over 20 wars; the map of the world changed and the rise and fall of many governments. In that time the field of invention has filled the world with utilities of convenience and pleasure. The greatest change has taken place, however, in our political and economic outlook and we face to-day many new and difficult problems.

These problems are so far-reaching and important that they will give the fire test to the faith and courage and strength of every citizen. The fathers and mothers who made America left us inspiration in the way they met the challenge of their time. With hearts and souls attuned to veneration for the example they gave and the heritage they left the generations, we must meet the problems of to-day with that high heart typical of those who gained and kept the faith in that far day—the faith that wrote a legend above the sunrise—that has guarded through all the years the way of liberty and law. It was not only the faith of those who fought the Revolution, but the faith of those who gave us the Bill of Rights, the Declaration, and our Constitution, and left to us the richest heritage between creation and to-day.

"Faith of our fathers! Living still
In spite of dungeon, fire and sword;
O, how our hearts beat high with joy
Whene'er we hear that glorious word!
Faith of our fathers, holy faith!
We will be true to thee till death."

I would be unmindful of an outstanding inspiration of this occasion if I failed to consider the underlying cause of the attendance of many thousands here to-day.

It springs from the fact that the true measure of the strength and fiber of a people is the esteem and veneration in which they hold those who have contributed to their glory as a nation. It shows that in spite of the ebb and flow of new and vicious doctrines and subversive activities; in spite of stress and economic disturbance—the American people, from the gray-haired mothers and fathers, who have seen history unfold, to the boys and girls who thrill us with the confidence and hope of their youth—that the real heart of the Republic is safe in the keeping of such sons and daughters as these.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTE INDIANS IN NEBRASKA

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Speaker's consent to address some remarks to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee at the present moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I have made this request for the purpose of interrogating the chairman of the Appropriations Committee with reference to how soon he may be able to present an urgency appropriation in behalf of relief for the destitute Indians over the country in general, and particularly in Nebraska.

Mr. BYRNS. I will say to the gentleman it is expected that the first deficiency bill will be ready for consideration in the House either on the first or second day after the holidays. We are practically through with the hearings and will have the bill completed by that time.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman does not know the urgent character of the situation, I would tell him that both the United Press and the Associated Press have recently carried accounts of the actual death by starvation of some little children out in the Ponca Indian Reservation, in Nebraska. Ever since last July I have been pleading with the Indian Bureau to get ready to take care of those unfortunates during the winter, that particular locality being within the drought and grasshopper zones. The commissioner tells me that he is trying, but he has not enough money. I plead with the chairman of the committee to get that emergency legislation before the House the first day possible.

Mr. BYRNS. I will say to the gentleman that the committee has already presented two resolutions involving the Employment Service and loans to veterans which were represented to the committee as being extremely urgent and necessary to be passed before the first of the year. Everyone is aware of the very great activity of the gentleman from Nebraska and his very earnest efforts to secure an appropriation for the relief of these Indians at the earliest possible moment, but the bureau did not request or recommend an immediate appropriation, feeling, no doubt, that it would come along in due course and, as I have already stated, the committee will have the bill ready on the first or second day after Congress convenes.

A GREAT MAN'S ANNIVERSARY

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. CLYDE KELLY, may have permission to print in the RECORD an address made by him at Alexandria, Va., on the 13th of December, in honor of the anniversary of Dr. James Craik, the friend of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with permission granted me through my colleague, Maj. WILLIAM R. COYLE, himself a direct descendant of Dr. James Craik, I publish herewith the address delivered by me at the services held December 14, 1931, in memory of the two hundred and first anniversary of the birth of General Craik.

The services were held in the old Presbyterian meetinghouse in Alexandria, Va., under the auspices of the Washington Society of Alexandria. Present on the occasion were descendants of General Craik and members of the following organizations: Society of the Cincinnati, Society of the Descendants of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence, Sons of the Revolution, Sons of the American Revolution, Society of the Colonial Wars and the Colonial Dames of America, Daughters of the American Revolution, Children of the American Revolution, grand lodges of masons in Virginia and the District of Columbia, St. Andrews Scottish Society, the American Legion and Auxiliary, World War Mothers, Federation of Huguenot Societies in America, the Virginia Medical Society, and the Daughters of the Founders and Patriots of America.

The address was as follows:

Mr. Chairman, descendants of Doctor Craik, members of patriotic societies, and fellow Americans, it is an inspiring thing that this memorial service should be held here in the old Presbyterian meetinghouse in Alexandria, one of the most beautiful and historic colonial churches in this country. There is an inspiration in the place, in the audience here gathered, and the memories here invoked. For many of us this gathering will be one—

"That never grows dim and is never forgot,
Like an unfaded leaf in a dead bouquet."

In time of confusion, doubt, and uncertainty it is of preeminent importance that we have a standard by which we may judge and measure events and currents of action. If the yardstick were a varying measure or the pound a fluctuating weight there would be chaos. The great United States Bureau of Standards is created and maintained because of the necessity of true standards in the manifold processes of business and daily life.

There are those who sneer at the tributes paid to men who have been adjudged great by succeeding generations. These cynical ones say there have been no great men, only ordinary individuals who happened to profit from fortunate circumstances.

In trying to search out a definition for a man who might justly be termed great I have evolved one which satisfies me, at least. It is this: A great man is one who, with cheerful, steadfast courage, gives himself to a noble cause.

Not one of these qualities can be omitted. Steadfastness is not the test of greatness, for a man may be utterly determined as he treads the path of evil and injury. Cheerfulness is not enough, for a Nero, fiddling happily while Rome burns, can not measure up to greatness.

Courage may be the possession of a traitor, like Benedict Arnold. Nor can giving one's self be the final test, else a Charles the Second, dying on the scaffold for tyranny and autocracy, would have his place on the roll of the great.

All of these qualities must be enlisted for a noble cause. Given that, the steadfastness, cheerfulness, courage, and self-sacrifice make the character of the truly great man glow with a radiance which can be recognized by all except those jealous and jaundiced souls whose eyes are fixed upon the mud and dirt at their feet.

Judged by the standard thus suggested, Dr. James Craik was a great man. If for no other reason, the patriotic societies represented in this service would be of supreme value because of their work in emphasizing and upholding time-tried standards of patriotism. They furnish the antidote to those cynical, destructive influences which would sweep away, if they could, the ancient landmarks and eliminate all the lessons learned in the past. Everything that is new is not necessarily dangerous, and everything that is old is not necessarily sacred; but he is an enemy of America who would blot out the memory of the great men and the great deeds of our past.

We have just heard read those passages from Doctor Craik's Bible wherein the brave old prophet Micah laid down the standard of true religion for all mankind. "What doth the Lord require?" he asked his people in a time of anarchy and distress. His answer can not be excelled for its conciseness and its all-inclusive truth. "Do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly before thy God" was the standard laid down and America has never produced a really great man who did not endeavor to shape his life to that standard.

You remember how another great prophet, Jeremiah, called upon his people in their time of distress and despair. "Set ye up a standard in the land" he proclaimed as the first step toward escape from the slough of despond. In every land and in every time of testing that is still the fundamental requirement.

It was true in 1787, when dissolution seemed about to come to the thirteen Colonies, which 11 years before had dared to defy the mightiest empire on earth, in the name of unity and cooperation. The great emotional desire for liberty and independence had lost its force after Yorktown. Each colony was jealous of its own rights and privileges. Misunderstandings arose and anarchy reared its head.

George Washington was the only true symbol of nationality in all the colonies. It was to his mighty influence we owe the assembly of the Constitutional Convention and the charter which was there evolved. Hear his ringing call to the delegates: "Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest may repair. The event is in the hands of God."

There can be no defeat in such a cause. You remember the experience of the two devoted friends, George Washington and Dr. James Craik, at the Battle of the Monongahela in 1755. General Braddock's army was overwhelmed and the brave but misguided general died in Doctor Craik's arms amid the rout and disorder of his shattered military forces.

In the long view of events, that battle on the site of the present city of Braddock was the first victory in the War of the American Revolution. When I presented the measure in Congress providing for the appointment of a United States commission to join in the celebration in 1930 of the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of the Battle of the Monongahela, I was met with the question, "Why celebrate a defeat?" I answered then as I answer now, that that battle in the western wilderness led straight to the victory at Yorktown.

When the colonists learned that the supposedly invincible British regiments had been totally overthrown by the French and Indians, but that Col. George Washington and his colonial associates had given a good account of themselves, they learned that the Americans were superior to European soldiers on their own ground, and that they must take the responsibility of defending themselves.

Had Braddock's army won the victory on that far-off July day, it is altogether probable that Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and the other Colonies would have continued to trust their defense in the hands of the British Army. They would have organized no forces of their own, would have gained no confidence in their own troops, and the whole course of history would have been changed.

Out of such an experience came the Declaration of Independence, which is the immortal standard of this Nation. The test of every action since 1776 is, "Does it help or hinder equality of opportunity?"

In spite of pessimists and cynics, any fair-minded survey of our progress must bring the conclusion that we have advanced steadily toward the goal in many lines. There is equality of political opportunity such as was never dreamed of by the founding fathers, and it has been secured step by step through the years. To-day the normal American man and woman have the right to express their opinions where they count most—with the pencil in the voting booth on the day of election.

There is equality of religious opportunity until at the last presidential election we saw two men asking for the highest office within the gift of the citizenship and both of them were members of faiths which were proscribed and forbidden in many of the colonies at the time of the Declaration.

There is equality of educational opportunity. Public schools, where every child, rich and poor, has equal rights, were unknown in 1776. To-day the public-school system extends from the primary grades to the great State universities, all of them maintained through tax funds place the burdens upon every member of the community.

These great strides toward equality of opportunity have been taken. Their benefits and blessings are in the sure possession of Americans. One great realm remains unconquered, and it furnishes the mightiest challenge to this generation if we are ever to attain the goal established in the declaration. It is equality of economic opportunity.

The right to the vote, to education, and to worship God at the dictates of one's conscience are admitted as inalienable rights of American citizens. There must come acknowledgment of the right of every American, able and willing to work, to a place in the American economic system, through which he can earn a livelihood for himself and his family.

With perhaps 7,000,000 Americans vainly seeking a place in the task of producing wealth, the tragic situation of to-day can not be exaggerated. This unemployment confronts us at every turn and scarcely a family in the land but is paying part of the price for such a situation.

This preeminent problem must and will be solved. It demands the spirit of cooperation rather than the spirit of destructive, cutthroat competition, which has been all too prevalent in our industrial and commercial system. We must learn to balance production and consumption, so that never again shall we witness the spectacle of great surpluses of wheat on one side and little children crying for bread on the other. If solving this problem means a change in our former methods of uncontrolled production and uncontrolled distribution, that change must come. Like the Sphinx of old, this problem confronts us with the challenge, "Answer my riddle or you perish."

We need no alien philosophies to point the way to action. Neither the pathway of fascism, with its dictatorship of one man, nor the pathway of communism, with its dictatorship of the proletariat, will be followed. We shall simply advance on the American pathway of equal opportunity, through democracy, taking the action necessary to put the foundations of reality under the old-time dream.

It will require enlightenment and participation on the part of every American and it will require loyalty to true standards. In the clouds to-day may be seen the black banner of corruption, the yellow banner of surrender, and the red banner of violence. They must not prevail and they shall not prevail. The American standard, upheld by patriotic hands, will lead the way to triumph in this greatest of all contests for equality of opportunity.

My friends, we do well to honor men like Dr. James Craik, who lived and died by true standards, which never changed, no matter how troublous the times. He was a bridge builder in a time when it seemed the quicksands had covered the solid ground. Of him it may well be written:

An old man, going a lone highway,
Came in the evening, cold and gray,
To a chasm, vast and deep and wide,
Through which was flowing a sullen tide.
The old man crossed in the twilight dim,
The sullen stream had no fears for him.
But he turned, when safe on the other side,
And built a bridge to span the tide.

"Old man," said a fellow pilgrim near,
"You are wasting strength by building here.
Your journey will end with the ending day,
You never again must pass this way.
You have crossed the chasm, deep and wide—
Why build you a bridge at the even tide?"

The builder lifted his old, gray head,
"Good friend, in the path I have come," he said,
"There followeth after me to-day
A youth, whose feet must pass this way.
This chasm that has been as naught to me,
To that fair-haired youth may a pitfall be.
He, too, must cross in the twilight dim.
Good friend, I am building this bridge for him."

Out of this memorial service for this great figure of another day, we ought to highly resolve that we, too, shall help to build a bridge over the swamp of present-day conditions, sinking the piers to solid rock, and building the span so wide and sure that the youth of to-day may cross to firmer land that we ourselves have known.

I am confident that this gulf of our own time will be bridged with sound construction. The pathway through the past shows such enduring structures and the courage and the consistency of men like Dr. James Craik, and his fellow builders, bid us proceed to the task in confidence that the pathway through the future will lead us on to the goal of America.

THE CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Consent Calendar.

The Clerk called the first bill on the Consent Calendar (H. R. 4577), to extend hospital and home facilities to veterans of the Confederate Army and Navy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill may prove to be controversial, and I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FISCAL RELATIONS BETWEEN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AND THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, all the bills that were reported by the Select Committee on the Fiscal Relations between the District of Columbia and the United States have been passed by the House of Representatives.

I now call up the report of the committee, which is House Report No. 1, and ask that the same may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

Mr. MAPES, from the Select Committee on Fiscal Relations Between the United States and the District of Columbia, submitted the following report (pursuant to H. Res. 285, 71st Cong.):

The Select Committee on Fiscal Relations between the United States and the District of Columbia appointed pursuant to House Resolution No. 285, Seventy-first Congress, has completed its work and submits the following report:

The substantive part of the resolution creating the committee is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Speaker is authorized and directed to appoint a select committee to be composed of seven Members of the House, whose duty it shall be to investigate the various elements, factors, and conditions which may be deemed pertinent and essential to the accumulation of data and information bearing upon the question of fiscal relations between the United States and the District of Columbia and to recommend to the House what amount, in their judgment, the United States should contribute annually toward the development and maintenance of the municipality.

"SEC. 2. Such committee is also authorized and empowered to investigate fully the various forms of municipal taxation and sources of revenue of the District of Columbia and to recommend to the House such new forms of taxation and sources of revenue and/or such changes in existing forms of taxation and sources of revenue as to them may seem just and fair.

"SEC. 4. The committee shall have the right to report to the House at any time by a bill or bills, or otherwise, the results of its investigations."

Soon after its appointment, beginning December 8, 1930, and ending December 20, 1930, the committee held public hearings at which representatives of various civic organizations and public officials of the District of Columbia and others who desired to do so appeared before the committee and presented their views as to what they respectively considered to be a solution of the problem of the fiscal relations between the United States and the District of Columbia.

For the purpose of aiding the committee in its work it engaged the services of Mr. George Lord, of Detroit, who has had many years' experience in tax-research work and who enjoys a national reputation in the field of taxation. With the appointment of Mr. Lord the assembling of comparative data relating to assessed valuations, etc., was immediately started. A questionnaire was prepared and sent to cities in the United States of comparable size with the District of Columbia, ranging in population from 252,981 to 900,429, asking for detailed information concerning the taxation of the various forms of taxable property within their respective jurisdictions.

All the cities consulted, with one or two exceptions, cooperated with the committee to the fullest extent in their endeavor to furnish the information called for. For this uniform courtesy the committee extends its appreciation to the officials of these municipalities.

In addition to the information furnished the committee by means of the questionnaire a large amount of data was obtained by correspondence, also valuable information was gained from consultations with noted authorities on taxation and finance. The statistical information obtained will be found in a condensed form in the statistical tables embodied in this report.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE FISCAL RELATIONS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The governmental set-up of the District of Columbia is unlike that of any other city in the United States, and so far as this committee knows it is unlike that of any other in the world. The constitutional provision requiring Congress "to exercise legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District * * * as may * * * become the seat of the Government of the United States" has led, starting almost from the beginning, to constant controversy both as to the form of the government of the District and as to how the expenses of the District government should be met, what proportion of them, if any, should be borne by the Federal Government and what proportion of them should be borne by the people and the privately owned property within the District.

As stated by Bryan in his History of the National Capital:

"The decade that came to an end in the early thirties * * * was * * * marked by an almost continuous agitation for a change in the government." (II Bryan 150.)

This agitation in varying degrees of intensity has continued down to the present time.

From time to time, as different phases of the controversy have become acute, committees of Congress have been appointed to investigate and report upon them. The reports of these various committees have, each in its turn, had a tendency to quiet the agitation for a time, but only for a time.

There is little that can be said about the relationship between the Federal and District Governments that has not already been said by one or another of these various committees. Nearly every phase of the problem has been investigated and reported upon by one or another of them, and this committee has no desire to review or rehash the same subject matter that has been heretofore thoroughly considered and reported upon. In undertaking the task assigned it, however, it did feel that no thorough and satisfactory study had ever been made of the comparative tax burden of the people within the District with those who live in other cities of comparable size and advantages, and that such a study should be made in order to determine what would be a fair and just tax for the people of the District to pay. It therefore set out to make such a study.

Up to the time of the adoption of the present form of government for the District in 1878, there had never been any uniform or consistent policy as far as making contributions by the Federal Government to the expenses of the government of the city of Washington or of the District of Columbia is concerned. It will be recalled that during the early history of the District there were five separate and distinct governmental units within its boundaries, namely: On the Virginia side of the Potomac, Alexandria, and the county of Alexandria; on the Maryland side, Georgetown, the levy court of the county of Washington, and the city of Washington. These were reduced to three in 1846 when the Virginia side of the District was re-ceded to the State of Virginia. In 1871 the charters of the corporations of the city of Washington, Georgetown, and the levy court were revoked and a single municipal government named the District of Columbia was established in their place. Since 1871 the city of Washington and the District of Columbia have been one and the same, or, to be entirely accurate, since that date there has been no such legal entity as the city of Washington. There has been only the District of Columbia. The Federal Government never contributed to the expenses of any of the other governmental units in the District except the city of Washington, and never adopted any uniform or consistent policy of making contributions to the city of Washington until the adoption of the present form of government for the District in 1878. Some years it contributed liberally, some years sparingly, and some years not at all.

The Poland report submitted to the House from the Committee on the Judiciary in 1874 referring to the question "Whether some accurately defined basis of expenditure can not be prescribed and mantained by law" declared:

"There never has been, since the location of the Capital at this place, any consistency, or even intelligence, in the adjustment of these expenditures."

The government of the city of Washington, and later the District of Columbia, has never been very successful in the management of its finances when left to its own devices. As early as February 2, 1835, the Southard report declared:

"The city is involved in pecuniary obligations, from which it is utterly impossible that it can be relieved by any means within its own control or by any exertions which it may make, unaided by congressional legislation."

On June 16, 1874, the Allison report stated:

"The testimony discloses that the District treasury is practically exhausted in all its departments."

Referring to the Territorial form of government with a Delegate in Congress, which had been in effect for three years, the same report declared:

"Your committee have unanimously arrived at the conclusion that the existing form of government of the District is a failure."

In this connection, and in view of the present agitation of some of the people of the District for the ballot, it may not be out of place to call attention to the experiences of the District when the people in it exercised the right to vote.

"Indeed, when some of the older or more thoughtful residents of Washington recall the riots of 1857 and other similar disturbances they lose all enthusiasm for the new movement to restore the suffrage to the people of the District. Many of them hesitate to join in the demand for the ballot, which just now is once again agitating the minds of the people. The Federal Capital, they believe, should be forever free from the strife, turmoil, and struggle of political campaigns, its atmosphere forever undisturbed by the quarrels of political partisans. The riots of 1852 have had a tremendous psychological effect upon the people of Washington." (Washington—A Not Too Serious History, page 212, by George Rothwell Brown.)

"These riots were no make believe." Page 212.

"In 1857 the extremists were not satisfied to fight with ballots, but used bullets; there was a real crisis in Washington." Page 213.

"Six men were killed in these riots, and more than a dozen were wounded. It was a bitter and humiliating experience." Page 215.

"Washington has witnessed other disorders in her hectic voting days of the past, but the riots of 1857 will always remain the bloodiest chapter of her purely political history. They have cured many of any desire for a repetition of such scenes, and have convinced others that perhaps the preservation of a calm and serene atmosphere for the deliberation of Congress and the labors of the President is worth more than the right to vote." Page 215.

As stated in the Southard report of 1835:

"The design of the Constitution and its founders was to create a residence for the Government where they should have absolute and unlimited control, which should be regulated and governed by them without the interference of partial interests in the States, which should be built up and sustained by their authority and resources, not dependent upon the will or resources of any State or local interest."

And again in the report of the joint committee of Congress in 1915:

"This was the great plan conceived by the fathers of the Government, the wisdom of which grows more and more apparent with the coming and going of the years."

The joint select committee of Congress, of which Senator Morrill, of Maine, was the chairman, reported in 1874:

"The committee recommends as best calculated to avoid a repetition of the errors and shortcomings of the past, and to promote the interests of all who are or may be in any way connected or associated with the National Capital in the future, that Congress exercise that exclusive legislation over the District with which it is invested by the Constitution, and provide for the general superintendence of its affairs and the enforcement of the laws through officers and agents directly amenable to the supreme executive authority of the United States."

Whatever one may think of the wisdom of the provision of the Constitution referred to, there is no doubt about the fact that it imposes upon Congress the duty and responsibility of providing for the government of the District.

In 1878 the present form of government for the District was adopted, and the policy inaugurated of dividing the cost of operating the District government equally between the citizens and property of the District and the Federal Government. In other words, the Federal Government contributed 50 per cent of the cost and the taxpayers of the District contributed 50 per cent. This plan was based upon the unique method of measuring the value of Federal property with that of the privately owned property in the District. A value of 30 cents per square foot was placed upon the streets and avenues, which added approximately 50 per cent to the valuation of actual Federal property, consisting of parks, public buildings, etc. In this way a valuation for Government property equal to the valuation of privately owned property was reached and Congress evidently was persuaded that the cost of operating the District government should be split evenly between the United States and the District.

In 1876 a joint investigating committee determined that the Federal share of the expenses of the District government should be fixed at 40 per cent. The recommendation of this joint committee, however, was not received favorably. The 50-50 law was in effect from July 1, 1878, to July 1, 1920, when a change was made from a 50 per cent proportion to a 40 per cent proportion of the total District expenses contributed by the Federal Government. This 60-40 plan continued until July 1, 1925, when Congress changed from the proportionate contribution to an annual contribution of $9,000,000. The Seventy-first Congress provided a lump-sum contribution of $9,500,000.

There has been a great deal of controversy from time to time as to the wisdom of changing from a proportionate plan of contribution to a lump-sum plan. Several of the civic organizations in the District have protested the change, setting up the claim that as the expenses of the District grew, it would be only fair that the contribution of the Federal Government should increase accordingly, and that this could only be fairly done by fixing definitely the proportion of the total expenses of the District that should be paid by the Federal Government.

The advocates of the lump-sum plan claim that it has the advantage of aiding rather than curbing the carrying out of public improvements in the District; that it tends to moderate local demands for appropriations through a realization that the increase must be locally borne; that being a definite and fixed amount it can at once be set down in the budget, thus simplifying budgetary procedure; that it makes possible an increase of appropriations needed for public improvements in the District within the limits of fair taxation without any increase of the burden upon an already overburdened Federal Treasury; and furthermore, that the economic condition of the country, together with the extraordinary burden of taxation carried by the people in the States and the condition of the Federal Treasury, is the answer to the demands for increased Federal aid to the District government.

A prominent member of the District bar and one of Washington's foremost citizens, Mr. George E. Hamilton, in a communication addressed to the joint select committee of Congress in 1915, expressed himself as follows:

"My observation of and contact with the affairs of the District forces me to the conclusion that the half-and-half plan has hindered rather than promoted the growth and development of the National Capital.

"It has tended to create in the minds of Congress the feeling that the interests of the District and the interests of the Government are separate and distinct, and even at times opposite if not antagonistic, and that in the matter of District appropriations the Government needed to be protected against the efforts of the citizens, who, in the opinion of some Congressmen, were paying too little taxes and seeking always to avoid proper taxation.

"It has created in the minds of some citizens the fear and feeling that Congress intended to overtax the citizens of the District to a point where Government contribution will cease, and these countertendencies thus created have been productive of criticism, of charge and recrimination, at times unseemly and always injurious.

"Fundamentally I believe the half-and-half plan is unjust.

"I believe, and have for years believed, that the growth of Washington along the lines intended by its founder, desired by the Government and hoped for by its residents has been delayed, if not dwarfed, by the half-and-half rule, and the feeling and contention by it engendered between Congress and its citizens; and I believe that further limitation to growth and prosperity will follow a continuance of that rule, or any other rule, of fixed proportions in contribution to the expenses of government.

"If Congress can be relied on to fairly consider, protect, and sufficiently appropriate for the larger and more important national interests and purposes, may it not be relied upon to consider and protect, to provide and appropriate for the support of the Nation's Capital and its development, especially if the full responsibility for the same is committeed to and assumed by it; and if Congress is determined not to give a fair and liberal treatment to the District, can it, in its absolute power, be coerced and driven thereto by a rule which may be repealed at its will and pleasure?

"Protect the District by providing a fair and equal assessment and a full but fair rate of taxation, to be levied only on privately owned real estate and improvements and on tangible personal property; avoid proportionate contribution to the expense of government, which of necessity creates a division and separation of interests and views and breeds contention; and let Washington be in fact what the framers of the Constitution intended it to be—the great Capital of a great Nation, to be nourished, expanded, and made beautiful by and for all people of the United States, the people of the District of Columbia contributing their fair share only."

At best, as was well stated by the joint committee of Congress in 1915, the half-and-half plan "was conceived as an economic necessity to lift the burden of debt from the oppressed District and its taxpaying citizens." And again, "This arbitrary rule—a rule of then seeming necessity—need no longer be applied to District appropriations."

The committee has given careful consideration to all arguments used for and against the lump-sum plan and has come to the conclusion that it is the preferable one.

GENERAL TAXATION

In the study of the taxation of general properties in the various cities of the United States having a population reasonably comparable with the population of the District of Columbia, it has been disclosed that in all these cities the people are groaning under the burden of taxation which they have been compelled to carry. That is particularly true of the taxes levied upon real property. This condition is made prominently evident by the extraordinary amount of delinquent taxes. The levy of taxes has become so large that a great many people have been unable to raise sufficient money to pay them, and the result has been an enormous amount of real property returned to governments delinquent for taxes. In a great many instances it has resulted in the loss of homes, farms, and other classes of property to those who have worked almost a lifetime in order to acquire them. A similar economic condition obtains in the rural sections of the country, if anything, to a greater extent than is found in urban districts. The committee calls attention to this fact in order that it may be given mature thought in the consideration of the comparative tax burden carried by the people of the District of Columbia with the tax burden carried by the people in other municipalities. Only in that way can a proper conclusion be reached as to the relative tax burden carried by the people in the District with that carried by people elsewhere.

Another thing that should not be forgotten in a study of this matter is that there has been a decided depreciation in realty values everywhere during recent years, particularly in the industrial urban centers. Notwithstanding this depreciation in values, the assessed valuations have not been reduced to any considerable extent and the public expenditures have been constantly on the increase, resulting in an increase in the levy of taxes. As a matter of fact, public expenditures in most of the cities have increased much faster than taxable wealth, which this committee thinks is anything but a healthy economic condition. This has been going on for many years and is one of the prime causes of the tremendous increase in tax levies, a condition that will get worse instead of better unless public expenditures are kept within reasonable bounds, and not in excess of the amount that the taxpayers can reasonably afford to pay.

ASSESSMENT OF PROPERTY—THE RATIO OF ASSESSED VALUES TO ACTUAL VALUES

In making a comparison of assessed valuations of property in the various cities it was necessary, of course, to ascertain at what ratio to actual value property was being assessed. In its study of this matter the committee found that various methods are used to arrive at a determination of the relation of assessed valuation to actual values, none of which determines such relation with absolute accuracy.

"The realm of science boasts no subject more elusive—more controversial—than value." Assessment Manual, City of Rochester, N. Y., 1930, page 1. There are so many factors to be considered in arriving at the valuation of property, such as the use, income, location, construction costs, reproduction costs, depreciation, etc., that no two minds will get to a very near approach to uniformity in determining such valuation. That is particularly true of those charged with the administration of assessment laws.

Although it is difficult to determine the relation of assessed values to actual values, the committee believes that the ratios as they appear in the statistical tables, attached hereto, are as accurate as it is possible to obtain. These ratios were obtained from the administrative officers of the municipal governments who actually make the assessments, and from such organizations as real-etsate boards, chambers of commerce, and individual citizens familiar with property values. These administrative officers, organizations, and citizens, being familiar with property values in their respective communities, are more competent to determine the actual ratio of assessed valuations to actual value than anyone else and, therefore, the information they furnished the committee is the most reliable that could be obtained for adjusting tax rates. That is particularly true where in the various assessment units a scientific method is employed of measuring the cubic contents of buildings, or the ascertaining of the square footage of such buildings, or where a scientific method of determining land values is employed.

The committee has found that one method of finding the ratio of assessed values to actual values frequently used to compare the assessed value of property with the price paid for it at voluntary sale. This the committee feels is not a safe method for the reason that most of the sales of real property are made on land contracts, in other words, on the installment plan. Sales of this character are frequently made at a substantial amount in excess of actual value. That is evidenced by the fact that these contracts are often discounted to finance companies and others dealing in such securities at anywhere from 10 to 40 per cent.

Another novel method employed by some to determine relative assessed valuations to actual values, relative tax rates, tax levies, etc., is the per capita basis of assessments. This is done by taking the assessed valuation of a given city and determining the per capita of that assessed valuation. The assessed valuation of other cities is then multiplied by this per capita and in that way it is said a true comparison can be made of the tax burden carried by the people in the different cities. This committee can not agree with this contention. Property values can not be created in excess of their actual value by any system of mathematical calculation. One city having approximately the same population as another may have within its borders property wealth far in excess of the other city. It is impossible to arrive at a true comparison of relative assessed valuations and tax levies by any such method.

INCLUSION OF FEDERAL REAL-PROPERTY HOLDINGS IN THE TAX BASE FOR COMPARATIVE PURPOSES

It is argued that no true comparison of the relation of the tax burden carried by the people in the District of Columbia with the tax burden carried by the people in other cities can be made without considering in the comparative the value of Federal property holdings located in the District of Columbia. The value of all Federal real property actually used for Federal Government purposes, it is claimed, should be embraced in the taxable real values, and this to the limit of structural costs, or present-day reproduction structural costs, irrespective of use, income, obsolescence, or market value. Evidently no consideration is given to the monetary value to the people of the District of Columbia because it is the Nation's Capital, nor to the benefits derived by the people in the District by the flow of visitors to the city who spend large sums of money while here. Neither is there any consideration given to the increment private property values, created almost solely because of the activities of the Federal Government in the District. It is perhaps needless to say that many citizens of the District have grown wealthy because of this increment value. It is only necessary to refer to the large increase in land values, as shown by the assessment rolls, to indicate to a considerable extent the truth of this statement.

The committee can not agree with the contention that the Federal real estate or property should be used in the comparison of relative tax burdens. The buildings owned by the Federal Government would be practically useless to anyone but the Government. They have practically no market value. The only value they have, except for Government purposes, is scrap value. They were not erected by anyone engaged in business for profit and can not be considered in the same class with the structures of ordinary business enterprises. Under such conditions it is decidedly unsound to use the cost or reproduction value of these buildings in any comparison of relative assessed values or tax burdens. Furthermore, much of the land value upon which these Government buildings stand was created by the Federal Government, and due consideration certainly should be given to this fact by Congress.

The principal reason advanced for including such property values in the comparative is that it is the only large industry in the District of Columbia, and that this industry is fairly comparable with large industries in other cities. The committee can not agree with this contention, either. The Federal Government's activities in the District have the highest degree of stability. There is no diminishing of is activities. Indeed, they are quite generally on the increase with a corresponding increase in the Government pay roll. They are continuous, not interrupted by financial and industrial depression. On the other hand, with industries in the other cities it is quite a different story. Anyone familiar with the industrial centers of the country will understand that often in times of depression, like we are now in, industries are a liability and not an asset to the other taxpayers. In many cases corporations are located immediately outside the corporate limits of a city while most of the employees live within the corporate limits. The corporation pays no taxes to the city, but the city is obliged, through its welfare department, to take care of the families of the men who are temporarily out of employment. The cost of this care is a heavy burden upon the taxpayers.

To verify this comparison of the economic conditions in the District of Columbia with the economic conditions that obtain elsewhere, it is only necessary to refer to a recent radio address by Mr. Robert J. Cottrell, executive secretary of the Washington Board of Trade, from which address we quote the following:

"While it is perfectly true that we are not tripping along in the merry and care-free manner of four or five years ago, it is nevertheless a fact, that as far as the National Capital is concerned, in comparison with other large communities, it hasn't any idea what depression is.

"No city in this country—in fact, no city in the world—is so peculiarly situated as Washington, in that it is practically impossible for it to know depression in the real sense of the word without a complete ruin of entire national and governmental economic structure.

"Planted in the middle of our city is an industry—that of the Federal Government—which continues on, and must continue on, regardless of conditions outside, and annually pours into the community nearly $180,000,000, or approximately $7,500,000 every two weeks. Rain or shine, good, bad, or indifferent, this gold clinks out into the hands of nearly 80,000 persons on the Federal pay roll.

"The board of trade in its activities through its greater National Capital committee has analyzed the situation in respect to conventions, visitors, and tourists. Tourist travel in some of the larger cities has fallen off as much as 35 to 40 per cent, while in Washington there has been a considerable increase.

"With the exception of isolated cases, Washingtonians have no business talking of depression. They have no grounds and, in fact, they ought to be expressing their gratification at living in a community untouched by the problems which are evident everywhere outside."

The committee can not see any logic in making a comparison of Federal Government properties with the properties of industrial corporations located elsewhere.

FEDERAL AID TO STATES

In discussions of the fiscal relations between the United States and the District of Columbia a comparison has been made of the amount of Federal aid given to States with the Federal aid given the District of Columbia. This comparison has little, if any, significance for the reason that very little of the Federal aid given the States reaches the municipalities. It nearly all goes to the rural communities. Furthermore, most of this money given to the States constitutes a conditional grant in that the States are required to match the amount of the Federal grant.

INCLUSION OF FEDERAL INTANGIBLE PROPERTY IN THE COMPARATIVE

A unique method has been employed and recommended to this committee in determining the amount of intangible Federal property holdings that should be charged to the Federal Government for the purpose of comparing the relative tax burden of the District with the tax burden of other cities. It is argued that the value of intangible personal property in the hands of private owners is about equal to the value of their tangible property. The tangible property owned by the United States and located in the District of Columbia, it is said, has a value of $90,000,000 and, therefore, that $90,000,000 of intangible property should be included in the comparative so as to place it on the same basis as the tangible and intangible property holdings owned by the citizens of the District. This, it seems to the committee, is purely an arbitrary set-up. There would be just as much sense in saying that $900,000,000 of Federal intangible property should be included in the comparative as $90,000,000. By what reasoning $90,000,000 of intangible property should be allocated to the District of Columbia the committee does not know. It is a rule of law that intangible property follows the domicile of the owner and, of course, the owners of the intangible property of the Federal Government are the people of the United States. For this reason there would be just as much sense in allocating $90,000,000 of the Federal intangible property to the city of Chicago as to the District of Columbia. Under no circumstances can intangible property of the United States be considered in any comparison made of tax burdens carried by the people of the various cities. Arbitrary set-ups of intangible-property values should have no consideration when it comes to matters of taxation. The only consideration should be the actual realities of values and the taxes levied thereon.

ASSESSMENT OF INTANGIBLE PROPERTY AS A COMPARATIVE

The use of the assessment of intangible property and taxes levied thereon for comparative purposes is exceedingly difficult and unreliable. The systems of taxation employed and the rates of taxes imposed upon this class of property vary so greatly in the various taxing units that no comparison can be made that would be worth consideration. In many assessment units intangible property is not directly assessed, other forms of taxation having been substituted for a direct tax on such property. In other taxing units no attempt has ever been made to tax this class of property at all, directly or indirectly. It is pertinent to say in this connection that a very considerable portion of intangible propery, such as money and credits, is in the form of trusts often scattered all over the country, and sometimes all over the world. Trust companies report these trusts and pay the taxes. Such taxes in a per capita comparison would be exceedingly unfair and unwise.

The committee doubts that the assessment of personal property and the levy thereon can be safely used in a comparison of tax burdens. In many taxing units some classes of tangible personal property are exempt from taxation, such as manufacturing products. Other forms of taxation, such as taxes imposed on franchises and the imposition of other excise taxes, are substituted for personal-property taxation.

For these reasons the committee thinks that the most reliable comparison of tax burdens is confined to the assessment of real property and the taxes levied thereon. In this connection it should not be forgotten that real property carries not less than 80 per cent of all assessed valuations and all taxes levied on real and personal property. Indeed, the total real-estate tax for the 23 cities used in the comparison, as shown in the comparative statement relating to assessments and taxes, constitutes about 83 per cent of the total tax. This is over four-fifths of the total taxes levied on both real and personal property and is, the committee thinks, the only reliable basis for comparison of the relative tax burden carried by the people in each of these cities.

LOSS OF REVENUE TO THE DISTRICT BECAUSE OF FEDERAL PROPERTY EXEMPTIONS

One of the chief arguments made for increased Federal contributions toward the expenses of the District government is that the District has suffered loss of taxes because of the exemption of Federal properties from taxation. In estimating the loss of revenue it has been the fashion to treat the Federal properties as if they were always on the assessment rolls of the District. This, the committee thinks, is a mistake. The only possible loss of revenue would be the revenue derived from the taxation of the land and improvements thereon immediately preceding the acquisition of the properties by the Federal Government. In other words, the amount of taxes paid by the private owners of property at the time the Federal Government acquired it. In this connection it is pertinent to say that the assessing officer of the District, Mr. Richards, contends that there is no loss of revenue because of the acquisition of these properties by the Federal Government. He arrives at this conclusion because the buildings on the land erased will be replaced by more costly structures in other parts of the city, and the improvements made by the Federal Government create an increment value in the immediate vicinities of the Federal holdings. While there may be a temporary loss of revenue, certain it is that there is a decided increment value created by the acquisition of this land by the Federal Government, the erection of costly structures thereon, and the beautification of the surroundings. To this extent, certainly, property values will increase and not decrease.

The actual value of the property acquired by the Federal Government from private owners in the last 10 years has been appraised by Mr. Richards, the city assessor, at $36,204,049, so that the loss of revenue from this valuation, based on the prevailing tax rate, would be a little over $600,000 a year. It is certain that no individual or private corporation would have made the costly improvements on the land that the Federal Government has made, and it is doubtful that improvements would have been made at all by private parties to any considerable extent. Furthermore, the appreciation in the value of land in the immediate vicinity of the Federal improvements, which appreciated value undoubtedly will be reflected in the assessment rolls of the District, will to a considerable extent offset the loss of revenue caused by the removal of this $36,204,049 from the assessment rolls, to say nothing of the replacement of the privately owned buildings in other parts of the District.

In this connection, attention may be called to the fact that the Federal Government is now engaged in a building program within the District of Columbia, to be completed within a few years, entirely at its own expense, at a total cost of over $300,000,000. Under the theory of taxing Federal property, or of including it in the comparative, the more the Federal Government improved and beautified the District with improvements and new structures the more it would be penalized or obliged to pay in taxes, notwithstanding the fact that no income is derived from public buildings that are devoted to public use. Under that system also the greater the improvements with the corresponding increase in value of the Federal property the less would be the tax on the privately owned property within the District.

COMPARISON OF TAX LEVIES PER CAPITA

Statistics have been presented to the committee to show that, based on the per capita basis, the taxes paid by the people of Washington compare favorably in amount with the taxes paid by the citizens of other municipalities, and in some instances exceed the amount paid by such citizens. Various methods have been followed in order to arrive at this conclusion, none of which appears to this committee as being a reliable basis for comparison of relative tax burdens. One city may have one-half the population of another city and still the smaller city may have within its borders much more taxable wealth than the larger city. That is particularly true in so far as personal-property wealth is concerned. To show how true this is it is only necessary to point out that there is an utter lack of uniformity in the various States and municipalities in the systems and methods employed in the taxation of personal property. In many of the cities the ad valorem system of taxation is followed, in others the millage-tax system is followed, in others income taxes are imposed as a substitute for both ad valorem and millage taxes, and in others there is either a total or partial exemption of certain classes of property. Because of this wide difference in the base of taxation no comparison of personal-property taxation on a per capita basis can be made with any degree of accuracy as to equality of burden.

If any consideration is to be given at all to per capita taxation it should be confined to the per capita taxes levied on real property. While the per capita taxes have been computed by Mr. Lord, of which mention will be found on another page of this report, for reasons already stated the committee does not believe it is a reliable basis for comparison of relative tax burdens.

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT RELATING TO ASSESSMENTS AND TAXES

Particular attention is called to the statistical compilation embodied in this report showing a comparison of assessed valuations, tax levies, etc., in each of the 23 cities used in the comparison. This statement the committee believes is as accurate a picture of the tax burden carried by the people of these cities as it is possible to obtain from the standpoint of statistical information. The valuations, tax levies, and tax rates were obtained in the first instance from the tax departments of the various cities. These data were verified by information obtained from various civic organizations, reference to reports of municipal directors of finance, and reports of comptrollers, together with the reports of the various tax commissions and special information obtained from them. The ratio of assessed valuations to the actual value of property was obtained from sources heretofore mentioned, supplemented by the knowledge of our investigator, Mr. Lord, of assessment conditions in the several cities, gained by previous investigations.

In determining the adjusted rate of taxation and the amount of taxes levied upon the specific amount of property valuation, the utmost care has been exercised. This, of course, was necessary in order that no injustice be done. There is such a wide variation in the laws governing the assessment of property and in the degree of efficiency with which actual assessments are made that if extraordinary care was not exercised injustice would result. In some of the States the statutes definitely fix the ratio to actual value at which property shall be assessed. In other States it is a constitutional as well as a statutory requirement that property be assessed at its full value, but nowhere probably is this requirement actually followed, much depending upon the efficiency with which the tax laws are administered as to how near an approach to actual value property is really assessed.

Particular attention is also called to the comparative statement of assessed valuations, tax levies, tax rates, etc., covering a 10-year period. This statistical compilation, showing, as it does, the per cent of increase in assessed valuations and in taxes levied, is exceedingly interesting and shows to what extent expenditures of tax money have exceeded the increase in taxable wealth. Furthermore, for comparative purposes this table presents a valuable study of actual general property taxation conditions that have existed in these cities during the last 10 years. The table is also of inestimable value in any study of relative tax burdens.

The statistics embraced in these two tables have been gathered after much painstaking effort, which required extensive research work. They present as accurate a picture of the relative assessed valuations and taxes levied in the various cities as it is possible to obtain.

The following remarks relating to these statistical compilations will be of interest:

The total population of the 23 cities embraced in the comparative statement is 10,959,751.

The total tax levied upon the real property in these cities amounts to $526,444,179, and the average per capita is $48.03.

Eliminating the District of Columbia, the total population of the other 22 cities is 10,472,882.

The total tax levied upon the real property in the 22 cities other than the District of Columbia amounts to $506,342,302, an average per capita of $48.35.

The population of the District of Columbia is 486,869 and the tax levied upon real property amounts to $20,101,877, or a per capita of $41.29, which is $6.74 per capita less than the average per capita for all the cities and $7.06 less per capita than the average per capita for the other 22 cities.

The total of all taxes levied in the 23 cities amounts to $637,129,676, an average per capita of $58.13.

The total of all taxes for all the cities, except the District of Columbia, amounts to $610,250,892, an average per capita of $58.27.

The total taxes levied in the District of Columbia amount to $26,878,784, a per capita of $55.21, or $2.92 less than the average per capita for all cities, and $3.06 less per capita than the average for the other 22 cities.

The total full valuation of real estate in the 23 cities amounts to $22,229,107,292, upon which was levied a tax of $526,444,179. The average adjusted tax rate for all the cities is $23.68.

Excluding the District of Columbia, the full value of real property in the other 22 cities is $20,915,259,131 and the total tax levied thereon is $506,342,302. The average adjusted tax rate is $24.21.

The adjusted tax rate in the District of Columbia is $15.30, or $8.38 less than the average adjusted rate for all cities, and $8.91 less than the average adjusted rate for the other 22 cities.

The average tax levied upon a $10,000 property is $237. Excluding the District of Columbia, the average tax on a $10,000 property is $242. The tax levied on the full value of a $10,000 property in the city of Washington is $153, or $84 less than the average for all the cities, and $89 less than the average for the other 22 cities.

These comparisons are based upon actual tax realities in the various cities, which the committee believes is the only fair comparison that can be made. In making the comparisons the committee has eliminated from consideration any and all arbitrary set-ups of values and taxes that would be levied on such values. Arbitrary set-ups of property values can be worked out to the advantage of any interests by mathematical calculations. They are not founded on facts, and therefore are not worthy of consideration.

It is the actual amount of money that the taxpayers pay into the public treasury upon their properties that counts, irrespective of what the tax may be named. That is the guide the committee has followed in its investigations, and the committee believes it is the only safe guide to follow for comparative purposes.

The committee does not deem it necessary to dwell further upon these statistics. It has endeavored to compile them in such a way as to be understandable by anyone who cares to study them.

BONDED DEBT

There will be found in this report a very interesting comparative statement showing the bonded debt of the various cities for 1921 and 1930, together with the per cent of increase, and the interest and sinking-fund charges for each of these years. It will be observed that the District of Columbia is the only city having no bonded debt.

EXEMPTIONS

Another interesting statistical statement shows the amount of real estate exempt from taxation in the various cities and the amount of contribution from any source because of such exemptions. It will be noted that the only contribution any of the cities received, outside of the District of Columbia, is the city of Boston. That city receives from the State government $32,950 annually for loss of revenue that would have been derived by the city from the assessment of the land used for State public institutions.

PARK AREA

There will be found herein a statement showing the park area in the various cities embraced in the comparative, the value of the parks, and the average annual cost of maintenance, etc. The figures given for the District of Columbia were obtained from the office of the city assessor. The figures for the other cities were obtained from the municipal authorities of the cities.

In this connection there will also be found a statement showing the park area located in the District of Columbia owned by the Federal Government. This information was obtained from the office of Col. U. S. Grant 3d, superintendent of public buildings and parks.

REVENUE DERIVED FROM TAXATION OF PUBLIC UTILITIES

A statement is embodied in this report showing the amount of revenue derived from the taxation of various public-utility corporations in 14 of the cities embraced in the comparative. This information will be of interest to everyone interested in the taxation of public-utility corporations.

CHANGES IN DISTRICT REVENUE LAWS—GASOLINE TAX

For eight years the District of Columbia has been imposing an excise tax of 2 cents a gallon on gasoline. There was derived during the last fiscal year from this tax approximately $1,800,000. There are only four States that impose as low a tax as 2 cents a gallon on gasoline; namely, Connecticut, Missouri, New York, and Rhode Island. In the other States the tax ranges from 3 cents a gallon to 7 cents a gallon.

The average tax for all the States, excluding the District of Columbia, is a fraction over 4 cents a gallon. In the States in close proximity to the District of Columbia, Delaware levies a tax of 3 cents a gallon, Maryland levies a tax of 4 cents a gallon, North and South Carolina levy a tax of 6 cents a gallon, Pennsylvania levies a tax of 3 cents a gallon, Virginia levies a tax of 5 cents a gallon, and West Virginia levies a tax of 4 cents a gallon, so that, as far as the tax on gasoline is concerned, the owners of motor vehicles in the District are in a favored class.

The claim is made that it is hardly fair to compare the gasoline tax in the District with the tax in the States for the reason that the revenue derived from such a tax in the States is used for improving public roads and not public streets, as is the case in the District of Columbia. It does not seem to the committee that there is much weight in that argument, for the reason that motorists from the District of Columbia use these roads, especially roads located in States bordering the District. Citizens of other cities pay the same gas tax as their fellow citizens of the State in which they live are required to pay.

It is also claimed by those opposed to an increase in the tax on gasoline that the District is now receiving sufficient revenue to take care of the entire expense of street improvements and maintenance. The facts, the committee finds, disprove that contention. Major Donovan, the District auditor, in his appearance before the committee stated:

"The amount of the gas-tax fund is not sufficient to take care of the entire street expense. About $2,000,000 will be paid in 1932 from the gasoline-tax fund; but in addition to that about $1,200,000 more will have to be provided out of the general revenues of the District for maintenance and repairs to streets."

So that it is certain, notwithstanding the statement that $2,000,000 would be derived from a tax of 2 cents a gallon on gasoline, that $1,200,000 additional money would have to be obtained from the revenues derived from other sources in the District in order to meet the entire expense of future street improvements and maintenance. Certainly no stronger argument could be made in support of a reasonable increase in the tax on gasoline than the statement made by Major Donovan.

The streets in the District of Columbia, as well as the streets in other cities, are subjected to heavy motor-vehicle travel, necessitating the raising by some form of taxation a large annual maintenance fund, in addition to the cost of widening and the creation of new arterial street highways. It is only fair, the committee thinks, that the owners of motor vehicles in the District should meet, to a large extent, these costs.

The committee can see no logical reason why the owners of motor vehicles located in the District should not pay a tax on gasoline reasonably comparable with the tax levied upon the same product in other communities, particularly in the communities adjacent to the District. Their failure to do so gives the retail gasoline industry in the District an undue advantage.

The committee, therefore, recommends that the present law providing a 2-cent tax on gasoline in the District of Columbia be increased to 4 cents a gallon, which rate of tax would be less than the average rate imposed on gasoline in the States, and is reporting a bill to that effect.

MOTOR-VEHICLE-WEIGHT TAX

Under the present system of taxing automobiles as personal property and the flat rate of $1 registration fee in the District, the owners of motor vehicles in the District have been and are in a highly favored class as compared with the taxes paid on motor vehicles in the several States. The flat rate of $1 registration fee, irrespective of the weight of the motor vehicle, can not be too severely condemned. It is the heavy cars, such as trucks and busses, that do the most damage to pavements and which occupy by far the most space in the public streets. To charge the same registration fee for such motor vehicles as is charged for a lightweight passenger car is ridiculous.

In addition to this flat registration fee of $1 per car, the District assesses all cars as personal property. According to the testimony of Major Donovan before the committee, there were a little over 126,000 motor vehicles assessed the first part of last year, and the revenue derived from the assessment of these cars for the one-half year period amounted to $214,190. On this basis, the total personal-property tax on that number of vehicles for the full year would be $428,380. It is evident, therefore, that the total tax, including the registration fee on motor vehicles, for 1930 would not exceed $600,000, or a total tax of $4.75 per car.

In addition to the 126,000 cars on which the tax was paid, Major Donovan stated that there were approximately 30,000 cars having no value, on which a minimum tax of $1 per car was paid. These cars were still being used on or occupying the streets, and certainly while in use on the public streets should be required to pay a tax comparable with the tax paid on other cars of approximately the same weight.

The average tax per car in 1930 in the United States was approximately $14, or about three and one-half times the average tax paid upon motor vehicles in the District of Columbia. The committee can see no reason why that condition should longer obtain. It believes that the most equitable system of taxing motor vehicles is a tax based on their weight. It is the simplest as well as the fairest and most equitable method of taxing them. It is conceded by everyone that the heavier the vehicle the more it damages the public highways. This fact should be a prime factor in the determination of the amount of tax that should be imposed on motor vehicles.

The committee, therefore, recommends the enactment of a law providing for a tax on automobiles based on their weight, as a substitute for the present registration and personal-property tax now imposed on motor vehicles in the District. If the rate of tax, based on weight, shall be fixed so as to produce an average revenue of $14 per car, which is the average tax per car in the United States, it would produce a substantial increase in the District revenues and no one would be hurt. The committee is reporting a bill to put this recommendation into effect.

INHERITANCE TAX

At the present time there is no inheritance or estate tax imposed in the District of Columbia, except the Federal estate tax. All States impose either a tax on inheritance or estates, except the States of Florida and Alabama.

A reasonable rate of tax on inheritances or estates imposed by the District government would produce an average annual revenue of not less than $750,000. The committee knows of no good reason why such a tax should not be adopted in the District, especially as the Federal Government permits a credit of all inheritance taxes paid in the States, or which may be paid in the District of Columbia, up to 80 per cent of the Federal estate tax.

The committee believes that the estate tax is preferable to the inheritance tax because of its simplicity. It has the advantage that the tax may be computed immediately after the value of the net taxable estate is determined. This results in a material saving in time and expense, both to the estate and to the Government that imposes the tax. Furthermore, it is easy for the testator to determine in advance the total tax burden upon the estate, and therefore he can carry out exactly his intentions as to the net amount which the several beneficiaries are to receive.

In the case of inheritance taxation the amount of tax depends upon the number and relationship of persons who receive the property. These facts, however, can not be determined as to the remainder until after the death of the life tenant. It often happens, therefore, that it is necessary to postpone the taxation of the remainder until the life tenant's death. In some cases arbitrary rules of determining the tax have been adopted and this quite often works hardships. Such complicated problems as these are avoided in imposing a tax on the estate.

The estate tax has the advantage of simplicity and of relative speed with which estates may be settled. The committee therefore recommends that a law be enacted providing for a reasonable tax upon the estates of decedents.

The Chilton joint committee in making its report in 1915 stated: "We believe there should be a proper tax on inheritances in the District."

The committee is reporting a bill to put this recommendation into effect.

INCOME TAX

The committee believes that a tax upon incomes is the most equitable tax that can be imposed, because it is based on ability to pay and is a tax that is hard to evade. More and more this is recognized, as evidenced by the increase in the number of taxing jurisdictions that have provided for a tax upon incomes.

The committee believes that if such a tax was imposed in the District of Columbia, as a substitute for the present millage tax on intangible property, it would result in greater equality in the distribution of the tax burden in the District and would produce a substantial amount of revenue in excess of that now obtained under the millage-tax system. Last year the District received a revenue of $2,725,941 from the tax imposed on all intangible property. It is our opinion that, if a reasonable income tax is adopted, the amount of revenue obtained therefrom will exceed the revenue from the tax now imposed on intangibles by not less than $750,000 annually and, as has already been said, the tax will be much more equitably distributed among the people.

An income tax would reach many people well able to pay some tax toward the support of government, who now pay no taxes, and it would reach the income derived from intangibles, which intangibles are now concealed from the taxing authorities of the District.

The committee, therefore, recommends the enactment of a law providing for a reasonable tax on incomes as a substitute for the present millage tax on intangible property, and is reporting this bill to put this recommendation into effect.

TAXATION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC UTILITIES

All the public utilities in the District are subject to specific taxation or franchise taxes. The tax is based on gross earnings or gross receipts and the rate varies according to the class of corporation.

The rate on the gross earnings of gas companies is 5 per cent. Electric street-railway companies are taxed at the rate of 4 per cent on gross receipts. Electric-light companies are taxed at 4 per cent on gross earnings. Telephone companies are taxed 4 per cent on gross earnings.

It will be noted that these rates of taxation are unequal and, therefore, violate the basic principle of equality in taxation. If the present system of taxing these utilities is to be continued, and the committee doubts its wisdom, the law should be amended so as to provide uniformity in the rate of taxation.

According to figures furnished the committee by the office of the District assessor, if these various utilities were taxed on an ad valorem basis of valuation the District would gain considerable revenue. These companies paid last year in taxes a total of $1,611,000. It is estimated by the District assessor's office that if they had been taxed at the same rate of taxation as imposed on other classes of tangible and intangible property they would have paid $2,500,000, or approximately $900,000 more than they paid under the present system. The present specific tax on gross earnings and gross receipts is in lieu of any ad valorem tax on tangible personal property and the millage tax on intangible personal property.

In addition to these public utilities there are two others operating in the District now—the Western Union Telegraph Co. and the Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. The Western Union Telegraph Co. last year paid in taxes only $6,471, and the Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. paid in taxes only $1,424. These companies practically tax themselves in that it has been the practice to accept without question a statement from each of the companies as to the value of its property in the District for purposes of taxation. There never has been any appraisal made of its personal property by the assessing officer of the District. The committee believes and recommends that an appraisal of the property of these companies in the District should be made by competent engineers.

TAXATION OF STEAM RAILROADS

There is contained in the law governing the taxation of steam-railroad property in the District a unique provision, as follows:

"It being the true intent and meaning hereof that the lines of railroads and terminals hereby authorized shall be assessed and valued for the purpose of taxation and taxed on the same basis as if the same were not constructed and maintained by means of such bridges, tunnels, viaducts, retaining walls, and other structures."

The construction placed upon this provision of the law by the assessing officers of the District is that the tunnels or bridges spanning the streets or water communications in the District, the retaining walls around Union Station and along Maryland, Delaware, and Virginia Avenues, and the iron viaducts located at the south end of the tunnel near New Jersey Avenue and C Street SE. are not subject to assessment for taxes.

It is estimated by the District assessor, Mr. Richards, that the value of this property, which is not now assessed for taxes, is anywhere from ten to fifteen million dollars. If it were placed upon the tax rolls, the revenue derived therefrom would approximate $200,000 annually, which is nearly double the tax now imposed upon railroad property in the District. The total revenue the District will receive from the taxation of railroad property this year amounts to $233,878.

The committee knows of no good reason why this property should be longer exempt from taxation, and if it can be legally placed upon the assessment roll by an amendment to the law, the committee recommends that the law be amended accordingly.

It is only fair and equitable that all privately owned property, especially that used for commercial purposes and profit, be placed upon the assessment roll for taxes. There should be no such thing as favoritism in the levy of taxes upon such classes of property. All should be treated with relative equality in the levy of taxes.

FISCAL RELATIONS OF OTHER NATIONS AND THEIR RESPECTIVE NATIONAL CAPITALS

For comparative purposes the committee thought it well to ascertain what contributions, if any, were made by other nations toward the municipal expenses of their respective national capitals. The result of such investigation follows:

Argentina

The Government of Argentina contributes in all approximately $7,490,000 annually toward the expenses of the city of Buenos Aires. This contribution is made up of 30 per cent of the Territorial contribution and of the patent taxes collected by the National Government in the city, together with 60 per cent of the benefits of the national lottery. This latter amount is used exclusively for the administration and maintenance of the hospitals of the city.

Information furnished by Hon. P. Santos Munoz, chargé d'affaires ad interim of the Argentine Republic.

Austria

No Federal appropriations are made in favor of the city of Vienna as a contribution toward governmental expenses of the capital. The city, it is stated, as a financial, commercial, and industrial center of the country, is entirely self-supporting and enjoys full and equal independence in the matter of legislation and taxation. It is further stated that the idea of Federal appropriations has never been raised.

Information furnished by Austrian Legation and transmitted to this committee by the minister of Austria to the United States, Hon. Edgar L. G. Prochnik.

Belgium

The Belgian Government does not contribute any money toward the municipal expenses of its national capital, the city of Brussels.

Greater Brussels is composed of a number of boroughs, each of which has its own independent civic administration and provides its own revenues for expenses.

Information furnished by the Belgian ambassador to the United States, Hon. Paul May.

Brazil

The Federal District of Rio de Janeiro has no governmental expenses allocated to it by the Federal Government or by the Union of the States of Brazil. The city of Rio de Janeiro and the suburbs forming the Federal District have their own revenue, and the district is administered by a prefeito, who is appointed by the Federal Government. The budget and municipal laws of the district are voted by the municipal council, the members of which are elected by the people in periodical elections.

Information furnished by the Brazilian ambassador to the United States, Hon. S. Gurgel do Amaral.

Canada

The Government of Canada has been contributing $100,000 annually toward the expenses of the government of the city of Ottawa, its national capital. It constituted a lump sum paid for the supposed benefit derived by the National Government from the fire, police, and other services furnished by the city. This arrangement was in effect for the past five years, but this year it came to an end. The city of Ottawa is now endeavoring to obtain from the Government of Canada an annual grant of $500,000.

Information furnished the committee by Hon. Hanford MacNider, United States minister to Canada.

Denmark

The Danish Government contributes approximately $11,000 annually to the office expenses of the superior president of Copenhagen, who, being chairman for the municipal administrative authorities of Copenhagen, takes part in the administration of the municipal affairs of the city, and incidentally, as a state official, has charge of several matters pertaining to superior offices. He supervises the administration of the State's municipal administration and, therefore, the office of the superior president. The Ministry of the Interior states that as the affairs connected with the superior president are to a certain extent state-government affairs, the state treasury grants for the time being an annual contribution of 40,000 kroner, approximately $11,000. This is the only contribution made by the National Government of Denmark toward the expenses of the municipal government of Copenhagen.

Information obtained from the Danish Ministry of Foreign Affairs by the Royal Danish Legation at Washington and transmitted to this committee by Hon. Otto Wadsted, minister of Denmark.

France

The Government of France pays nothing to the city of Paris for the numerous buildings occupied by the Parliament, the Government, the public administrations, and the diplomatic establishments. Paris has never been given a special place in the assessment scale because of its situation as the capital of the Republic. There are, however, certain subventions that the city of Paris receives as follows:

"(a) Municipal police: The share of the state is, in principle, one-half of the expenditure. In reality, for 1931, the state budget provided for a sum of 171,700,000 against a receipt of 197,500,000 francs carried to the budget of the city.

"(b) Paving: The receipt anticipated by the city for 1931 is 11,914,000 francs. It must, however, be remarked that this sum does not represent a subvention property so-called; it constitutes, in reality, a reimbursement, the town providing for the upkeep of the national roadways which traverse it.

"(c) Expenditure for assistance: State participation, about 5,400,000 francs.

"(d) Aid to the unemployed: The state budget only provides for a sum of 2,700,000 francs. In reality, these expenses reach at the present time about 49,000,000, of which 16,200,000 are at the charge of the state.

"On the other hand, the city of Paris reimburses to the state one-half of the expenses of the pay and maintenance of the Garde Republicaine."

Summed up, the total amount of contribution to the municipal expenditure of Paris amounts to approximately 205,000,000 francs out of a total budget of a little over 4,000,000,000, which is not quite 5 per cent of the total. Be it said, however, that no part of this sum of 205,000,000 francs is in reality granted to the city of Paris because of its position as the national capital.

Information obtained from the Foreign Office of the French Government by the American ambassador, Hon. Walter E. Edge, and by him transmitted to this committee.

Germany

The German Government does not contribute in any special way financially to the municipal administration of Berlin, for the reason that it is the seat of the National Government.

Information obtained for the committee by the German ambassador, Herr F. W. Von Prittwitz.

Great Britain

No special grant is made by the Government of Great Britain toward the expenses of the local government of London as the seat of the national capital. There is a special contribution, however, of about 10,000 pounds (about $45,000) made by the Exchequer toward the expenses of the London fire brigade for services rendered. There is also a small contribution to the metropolitan police for services rendered. A similar grant, however, is made to other cities of the country.

These contributions are in the form of grants in aid of specific services rendered the National Government. The National Government makes a contribution in aid of local rates in respect of property occupied by, or in behalf of, the Crown for public purposes. There is, however, no distinction in practice between contributions in respect of Crown property situated in London and outside of London. The amount of such contributions is based on the valuation determined by the treasury valuer instead of the valuation determined by local assessment officials.

Information furnished by the British Foreign Office and the Minister of Health and transmitted to the committee by the American ambassador to Great Britain, Hon. Charles G. Dawes.

Greece

The Government of Greece grants to the city of Athens 18,000,000 drachmas annually, paid in monthly installments. The drachma being of unstable value, it is almost impossible to state definitely what amount in dollars this contribution amounts to. The drachma has varied in value from 13½ to 19½ cents. Taking the highest quotation, the annual contribution amounts to approximately $3,500,000.

Information obtained from the Government of Greece and forwarded to this committee by Hon. A. Anninos, counselor of the Legation of Greece.

Italy

The Italian Government pays toward the expenses of the city of Rome an annual sum of 60,000,000 lire. Because the lira fluctuates greatly in value it is impossible to state with any degree of accuracy what the contribution would be measured in dollars and cents.

Information furnished by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs in Italy and transmitted to this committee by the counselor of the Italian Embassy, Count Alberto Marchetti di Muriaglio.

Japan

Municipalities, towns, and villages in Japan are charged by law to collect a certain kind of national tax, and 3 per cent of the amount collected is returned to the municipalities, towns, and villages. This year the city of Tokio received 569,700 yen, equivalent to approximately $330,000.

The National Government also assumes a part of the expenses of the teachers of primary schools located in cities, towns, and villages. The law provides that the total amount appropriated by the Government for this purpose should not be less than 85,000,000 yen a year. This year the city of Tokio will receive 1,084,880 yen, or approximately $540,000.

The city also receives from the National Government certain subsidies, as follows:

"(1) 500,000 yen toward the expenses of road improvement.

"(2) 266,547 yen toward the expenses of various unemployment relief works.

"(3) 410,000 yen toward the expenses of the city water system."

The total of this national aid toward the expenses of the city of Tokio amounts to approximately 2,921,127 yen, or $1,460,563. In addition to this the national treasury of Japan gave a large amount of money toward the expenses of the reconstruction of the city following the earthquakes.

Information obtained from the Japanese Government by the Japanese ambassador in Washington and forwarded to this committee by the Hon. K. Midzusawa, secretary of the embassy.

Mexico

The Federal Government of Mexico does not contribute to the expenses of Mexico City. The Federal District in which the national capital is located has its own budget, independent from the federal income, and the expenses of Mexico City and the other municipalities are attended to from that budget.

Information furnished the committee by the Hon. Don Manuel C. Tellez, Mexican ambassador to the United States.

Poland

No item of contribution has been included in the national budget for 1930–31 toward the expenses of the city of Warsaw, the national capital. In the report accompanying the budget the following sentence is to be found, however:

"The Minister of Finance is empowered to grant to the local self-governing communal and territorial bodies loans out of the cash stock, which loans must not extend over 12 months and must not exceed 20 per cent of all taxes perceived by the government revenue offices on behalf of such self-governing bodies."

Information obtained from the Polish Government by its ambassador to the United States and transmitted to this committee by Hon. W. Wankowicz, commercial counselor.

Spain

The Government of Spain does not contribute any money toward the expenses of the city of Madrid. It is stated that on several occasions the Municipal Council of Madrid has solicited from the National Government a fixed subsidy to cover the expenses resulting from the city's position as capital of Spain. Up to the present time, however, no such subsidy has been granted.

Information obtained from the Spanish Government by the Hon. Irwin B. Laughlin, ambassador to Spain, and transmitted to this committee by Hon. J. Webb Benton, second secretary of embassy.

Sweden

Neither the Swedish Government nor Parliament makes any special appropriations to the city of Stockholm as the seat of the National Government.

Information obtained from Hon. W. Bostrom, minister of Sweden to the United States, and transmitted to this committee by him.

Switzerland

The Government of Switzerland makes no contribution whatever toward the expenses of the city of Berne, its national capital.

The law of that country provides that the federal treasury and all special funds administered by the Federal Government, as well as all the real estate, houses, and institutions which serve the purposes of the Federal Government, are exempt from any direct taxation. A statement is made that to be the capital of Switzerland is considered an honor and that the location of the capital was coveted by several cities at the time the question of the choice of one of them as the seat of the Federal Government was discussed.

Information was obtained by the Legation of Switzerland and transmitted to this committee by Hon. Pierre de Salis, attaché.

Yugoslavia

The Royal Yugoslav Government does not contribute any money toward the expenses of the municipality of Belgrade, its national capital.

Information furnished by the Royal Yugoslav Legation and transmitted to the committee by the Hon. Bojidar Stoianovitch, first secretary of the legation.

CONCLUSIONS

No one likes to pay taxes. The people of the District of Columbia are no exception to the general rule in this respect. Nor is it a pleasant duty to vote to impose a tax burden upon anyone. It can not be stated too emphatically that no one, especially no member of this committee, wants to overtax the people of the District. At the same time it is probably fair to say that the people of the District, being human, do not want to pay any more taxes than they are obliged to pay, and very naturally resist any effort to increase existing taxes or to impose any additional ones, realizing, no doubt, that whatever they pay, whether much or little, the Federal Government will make up the balance necessary to run the District government. On the other hand, there are those who think that the people of the District are in a privileged class as far as taxation is concerned; that they are not paying as much toward meeting the expenses of the District government as they should, or as much as the people who live in other cities in the United States of comparable size and advantages are required to pay.

Should the people of the District be required to pay the same as people who live in other cities of comparable size and advantages, or should some consideration or concession be given them because they have no voice in their government, or should they be required to pay a little more because they enjoy the privileges and advantages of living in the Capital City? Should the District be treated like any other city and the people who live in it be required to pay the entire expenses of the District government as the people of other cities are required to do, or does the country want a more beautiful and magnificent city for the capital of the Nation than the people of the District should be asked to maintain or would require if it were not the Capital City?

These are some of the questions which naturally suggest themselves to anyone who makes any serious attempt to consider the tax problem of the District.

Section 2 of the resolution creating this committee, authorizes it to "investigate * * * the various forms of municipal taxation and sources of revenue in the District" and to recommend such "new forms of taxation and sources of revenue and/or such changes in existing forms of taxation and sources of revenue as to them may seem just and fair," and section 4 gives the committee the "right" to report "by a bill or bills, or otherwise, the result of its investigations."

Carrying out the purposes of the resolution in this respect, the committee, as hereinbefore set forth, recommends the enactment of an income and an inheritance tax law for the District, an increase of the gas tax from 2 cents to 4 cents per gallon, the enactment of a motor vehicle weight tax law, a change in the taxing system of certain public utilities, and a revision of the law providing for taxation of the property of steam railroads in the District.

The committee has prepared and is introducing bills which it asks the House to consider and pass, providing for an income tax, an inheritance tax, an increase in the gas tax from 2 cents to 4 cents per gallon, and a motor-vehicle weight tax. The people in the States pay these taxes. If people of the District are to pay taxes that are comparable with those paid by people in the States, they should pay them. As to these taxes there is no chance for argument from a comparative standpoint. In fact, the rates suggested in the bills reported by the committee are somewhat under the average of the States. If they are not imposed in the District, the District is bound to be a haven for tax dodgers, for those who want to escape the payment of such taxes.

The committee feels that the changes recommended in the laws relating to the taxation of certain public utilities and of the property of the steam railroads should be considered and perfected by the regular standing legislative Committee on the District of Columbia; that to perfect such legislation would require more time and consideration, including the hearing of those interested and affected by the proposed changes, than this committee is justified or warranted in taking for that purpose.

The committee thinks that the major problem assigned to it, and the one chiefly in the minds of the Members of the House of Representatives when the resolution creating the committee was passed, was, as stated in the first paragraph of the resolution—

" to investigate the various elements, factors, and conditions which may be deemed pertinent and essential to the accumulation of data and information bearing upon the question of fiscal relations between the United States and the District of Columbia and to recommend to the House what amount, in their judgment, the United States should contribute annually toward the development and maintenance of the municipality "— and it has devoted a large portion of its time and study, with the assistance of its tax expert, Mr. Lord, to this feature of the resolution.

In view of the facts developed in its investigation and study, and the findings, as before set out in this report, how much should the United States, in the language of the resolution, " contribute annually toward the development and maintenance of the municipality " of the District of Columbia?

This question, like many other governmental questions, is not " susceptible of exact determination," but it is a question that Congress is obliged to pass upon every year in the passage of the annual appropriation bill for the District. In the performance of this duty Congress has a dual obligation to perform. It must be fair to the people of the District; and it must be fair to the people of the Nation who live outside the District. It is the principal question assigned to this committee to answer and to report upon.

There is no serious dispute about the principle to be followed in working out an answer to the problem. The difficulty comes in its application.

The witness appearing before the committee from the District very generally, if not without exception, agreed that the people of the District should pay in taxes about the same or bear about the same tax burden as people of other municipalities throughout the United States of like size and advantages, but the majority of them were tenacious in their contention that they are already doing that, and many ingenuous arguments are advanced to prove that contention.

The joint committee of 1915 recommended—

" that the people of Washington pay a tax comparable in assessment, rate, and amount to that tax paid by the residents of other cities similar in population and location to the city of Washington."

The report of that committee went on to say:

" We find after a most careful consideration of all of the evidence and circumstances as shown to exist at this time that there is no reason for any arbitrary rule of proportionate contribution for the expenses of the District of Columbia by the residents thereof and by the people of the United States; that the correct rule should be that the responsibility in taxation of the residents of the District of Columbia be as fixed and certain as the responsibility of residents of other American cities comparable with the city of Washington; that with the payment of such taxes as may be equitably and properly assessed against privately owned taxable property, the financial responsibility of the residents of the District should be concluded."

The Morrill Joint Select Committee of 1874 reported that the District " may properly be required to make that just contribution to the current annual expenses, the interest of the public debt and its ultimate payment, which a people so situated as compared with other communities may be required to pay for like protection, privileges, and immunities."

This committee believes that the correct formula is stated in these reports, as above quoted, and it is happy to say that that formula is generally accepted as being correct by students of the situation, both in and out of the District.

The committee has no doubt that everyone in the United States desires the National Capital to be one of the best and most beautiful capitals in the world, and that it forever be maintained as such, and that Congress shall, if necessary, from time to time, assist financially in maintaining it at a standard that shall be excelled by no other capital. The amount of this financial assistance should be measured largely by the amount necessary to conduct the governmental affairs of the District in an efficient and economical manner, over and above the amount of revenue derived from the taxation of private property, license fees, etc. The rate of tax imposed on private property to reasonably approach the average rate of taxation in the other 22 cities of the comparative. In other words, the amount of Federal contribution toward the expenses of the District government should be based largely on the difference in the amount of revenue derived from the taxation of properties levied on the basis of a fair and equitable tax rate, together with the revenues derived from specific taxes, license fees, fines, etc., and the total amount of money that the District needs to conduct the District government in a manner that shall be a credit to the District and the Nation. There are few indeed who seriously dispute the correctness of this statement.

On this basis, the committee has made the study it has to ascertain with as much definiteness as it is possible to do how the tax burden of the District compares with the tax burden in cities of similar size and advantages, with the result, as before stated in this report, that it finds that the tax rate in the District of Columbia is the lowest of any of the 23 cities with which comparison has been made.

To repeat what has already been discussed to some extent in another part of this report, based on the assessed valuation of real property at a ratio of 90 per cent of its actual value, and this is the ratio that the assessor, Mr. Richards, advised the committee is the ratio at which it is assessed, the adjusted tax rate in the District of Columbia is $15.30 per thousand dollars valuation. The next lowest adjusted tax rate is in Kansas City, where the rate is $17.58 per thousand dollars valuation, or $2.28 per thousand more than obtains in the District of Columbia. The highest adjusted tax rate is in the city of Louisville, where the rate is $30.80 per thousand dollars valuation or $15.50 per thousand more than obtains in the District of Columbia. The average adjusted tax rate for all the cities is $23.68 per thousand dollars valuation, or $8.38 more than obtains in the District of Columbia. Excluding the District of Columbia, the average adjusted tax rate in the other 22 cities is $24.21, or $8.91 per thousand more than obtains in the District of Columbia.

Applying the adjusted tax rate, a piece of property in the District of Columbia having a full value of $10,000, would pay a total tax of $153, or $23 less than the lowest tax rate in any of the other cities. The average tax paid upon a $10,000 property in all the cities, excluding the District of Columbia, is $242, as against $153 in the District of Columbia.

It is evident, therefore, that the owners of real property and tangible personal property in the District of Columbia are not burdened as heavily with taxes as the owners of similar property of relative valuation in the other cities; that they pay less taxes on their property than the owners of property in any of the metropolitan cities of the country. If the rate of taxation in the District had been $20 per thousand, instead of $17 per thousand, the present rate, the District government would have received nearly $4,000,000 more in revenue in 1930 than it did receive. This $20 per thousand valuation would then be over $4 per thousand less than the average adjusted tax rate in the other 22 cities. If the rate in the District of Columbia was the same as the average adjusted rate in the other 22 cities, the District government would have received $31,222,907, or $9,298,520 more revenue than it did receive in 1930.

It is contended by some that in the consideration of comparative tax burdens all taxes levied in other cities for State and county purposes should be eliminated and the comparison confined to taxes levied for the purposes of city government alone in those cities and that interest on the bonded debt of other municipalities be eliminated from the comparison because the District has no bonded debt.

The committee can not agree with that contention. There are in the District institutions maintained from revenues derived from either Federal or District taxation similar in character to institutions that are maintained by county or State governments. The District has its courts, similar to county and State courts. Other functions in many respects similar to functions exercised by State and county governments elsewhere are performed in the District either by the District or Federal Government. The District government does practically everything that the various units of government do outside in the States, and the people of the District receive from the Federal Government the various benefits and services that are taken care of outside by county, State, and school taxes.

The true index to tax burdens is the actual tax levied and paid into the public treasury by the owner or owners of property in the various cities having relatively the same actual value. In the opinion of this committee it makes no difference by what name the tax may be called, a State tax, a school tax, a city tax, or a county tax, it is the actual money paid over the counter of the public treasury that counts, and that is the only true measure of comparative tax burdens.

Nor does this committee agree with the contention that the interest on public debts of other cities should be eliminated. Other cities have been forced into debt for different reasons, principally because their tax burden has been so great that they could not afford to add to it for the cost of needed permanent public improvements. The District of Columbia is in a favored position in this respect, made possible to a large extent at least because of the financial assistance received by it from the Federal Treasury. As an illustration, the water system of the District was originally paid for by the Federal Government. It is obvious that if the cost of permanent public improvements in other cities had been included annually in their budgets the rate of taxation in those cities would have been much higher and therefore the comparison with the rate prevailing in the District of Columbia would show a correspondingly wider difference than is now shown.

The committee has no sympathy with the attitude of hostile criticism of the improvement and development of the District and everything that is done by Congress to that end, that is sometimes expressed. The District of Columbia is probably the most beautiful and magnificent Capital in the world. Travelers returning from abroad are loud in their praise of it. They say that there is no other Capital that compares with it in beauty and magnificence. The committee has already quoted from Washington—

A Not Too Serious History, by George Rothwell Brown. It believes that this history is accurate and impartial, as well as "not too serious." It quotes from it again:

"It is the fashion for many of the good people of Washington to complain petulantly of the neglect of Congress, and, indeed, some Congresses have been inconceivably tight fisted and narrow; but when one considers the great miracle which has been wrought in a short space of time, and remembers that Congress has largely supplied the entire Capital of vision and money which has brought it about, it is not easy, in all conscience, to be fault finding."

Since the above statement was made, the Federal Government, through Congress, as before mentioned in this report, has inaugurated and is now engaged in a building program in the District at an estimated cost of over $300,000,000, to be paid entirely by the Federal Government at no cost to the District.

The people of the District of Columbia enjoy benefits and privileges that are not enjoyed by the people in any other city. In no other city in the country do the people enjoy so many advantages by way of beautiful parks, library facilities, etc., as are enjoyed by the people in the District of Columbia, not to mention the innumerable and immeasurable advantages and privileges incident to being a resident of the Capital City. They are created and maintained to a considerable extent at the expense of the people of the United States and not at the expense of the people of the District of Columbia alone and constitute no part of the District budget.

The committee does not desire to place any undue burden of taxation upon the people of the District. On the contrary, because of the peculiar governmental set-up of the District, it prefers to err, if any error is to be made, on the side of liberality toward the District. Indeed, a majority of the committee at least does not hesitate to say that it does not want to make the burden of taxation in the District as heavy as it is in other cities of comparable size and advantages, because the committee believes that taxes are too high and too burdensome in practically every locality in the United States outside of the District of Columbia. The committee concedes that the government of the District of Columbia for the most part is efficiently and economically administered, without undue waste or extravagance and desires to give the District the benefit of such administration. The committee has studied the problem from every possible angle, without prejudice, and desires to do justice not only to the taxpayers of the District but to the taxpayers of the United States who live outside the District, as well.

It is the aim of the committee to give the House sufficient statistical information and data to enable every Member, not only now but in the future, to reach his own conclusion, from the information given, as to what the contribution of the Federal Government toward the expenses of the District government should be. The committee considers this feature of its report of prime importance.

The committee does not hesitate to say that in its judgment the tax rate, the tax burden, in the District is not as high, is not as burdensome, as it is in comparable cities, nor as it is in nearly every community, urban or rural, in the United States. Anyone who thinks that it is is either fooling himself or blind to the actual facts. He can not realize how the average citizen is almost literally sweating blood in order to pay his taxes and many are utterly unable to do so.

The committee does hesitate, however, to make any recommendation, the effect of which might lead to a tax rate in the District equal to the average, even of those in other cities of comparable size and advantages, because it is impressed with the fact that such a rate on general property is too high, that it is overburdensome, and often prohibitive. The committee believes that the general property tax should be relieved by other taxes, such as are herein recommended, wherever it is practicable to do so. At the same time the committee can not help but feel that the tax rate in the District might well be raised to more nearly approach the average of other cities without any injustice to the District, or without giving the District any reasonable cause to complain.

The present law provides that the tax rate in the District shall be not less than $1.70 per hundred of the assessed valuation of real estate and tangible personal property. As before stated, if the rate had been $20 per thousand valuation, for example, which is considerably below the average rate in the comparable cities, it would have produced a revenue, based on the 1930 valuation of property, of $25,793,397, as against $21,924,387 that was levied on such property in 1930.

It is not the province of this committee, however, to recommend a rate; it is rather to recommend what amount in its judgment the Federal Government should contribute annually toward the development and maintenance of the municipality. The rate will depend upon the budget, the cost of the District government. It is largely in the hands of the District to determine the rate. It will be for the District, in asking for appropriations, largely to determine whether the general property tax will be increased or not, and that is as it should be.

The committee feels that for the present, at least, the Federal Government should continue to contribute something toward the expenses of the District, the Capital City of the Nation; that to do so is perhaps wise public policy and in accordance with the public sentiment of the country, but, with the constantly increasing values of privately owned property within the District, it becomes progressively more easy for the District to meet the expenses of the District government as the years go by, without undue burden or any increase in the general property tax. The time may come when the District should in all conscience meet the total normal budget of the District government.

The District budget for the fiscal year 1933, beginning July 1, 1932, and ending June 30, 1933, submitted to Congress within the last few days, estimates that the appropriations for the District during that year, including deficiencies, will total $45,633,312 and that the revenues of the District, based upon a contribution of $9,500,000 by the Federal Government, will amount to $45,670,000, leaving a surplus of revenues over expenses of $36,688.

If the bills reported by the committee are enacted into law, approximately $4,000,000 will be added to the revenues of the District, without any increase of the general property tax and without any increase of the assessed valuation of general property. The Federal contribution could be reduced that amount for the fiscal year 1933 at least, without interfering with a balanced budget. The committee feels, however, that on account of present economic conditions the budget estimates for the fiscal year 1933 have, perhaps, been reduced to a lower figure than it would be safe to depend upon as a permanent policy, but the increased revenue provided for in the bills which the committee is reporting, and the additional revenue that may be raised by the changes in the laws relating to the taxation of the property of steam railroads and of certain public utilities in the District, recommended by the committee, together with the natural increase from a constantly increasing valuation of privately owned property within the District, together with the contribution of the Federal Government recommended by the committee, should take care of any normal or reasonable increase in the District budget for years to come, leaving the margin between the present rate of taxation in the District and the average rate of comparable cities to take care of any contingencies or emergencies, if need be, or any unusual expansion or increase of services which the District may desire. The annual contribution recommended by the committee, the committee believes, will not only be fair and just to the District but under present economic conditions exceedingly liberal.

The committee realizes that if the recommendations of the committee as to new legislation are not enacted into law that it will be necessary to increase the general property tax in the District, or the amount of Federal contribution recommended by the committee, in order to meet the District budget, but it feels that the recommendations are so eminently just and fair that they should be enacted into law and that if they are not that the general property tax should be increased to more nearly approach that of the average of comparable cities.

Taking all the circumstances and conditions as they exist into consideration, as long as the fundamental factors in the District remain as they are, the committee recommends that the United States contribute annually toward the development and maintenance of the municipality of the District of Columbia a lump sum of not to exceed $6,500,000.

Respectfully submitted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the report be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report was agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with Mr. LOZIER in the chair.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] such time as he may desire.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, last Friday, when the moratorium question was under consideration, I found that it was impossible to get time to explain my position on the moratorium. Because of that fact I am asking that I may proceed at this time to make such explanation as a justification of my vote against the debt holiday.

First, I wish to state that last June, like all other Members of Congress, I received a communication from the President of the United States inquiring as to my attitude upon the proposition of an international debt holiday.

Press dispatches at that time indicated that Germany was upon the brink of financial ruin, and virtually that the solvency of the whole world was at stake. I replied to the President in substance that this was a matter that could not be decided by Congress until it convened in regular session in December or was called in extra session by him for that purpose, and that in the meantime it was my intention to endeavor to inform myself on the question and to withhold my decision until the Congress should meet.

Mr. Chairman, I took the position in June last, and I am of no different opinion now, that this Government should not commit itself to any course touching a debt holiday until the whole question of intergovernmental debts—and it is a large, involved one—had been exhaustively investigated by Congress, for it is the entire people of this country against a relative few that will suffer by too precipitous action should we embark upon an unwise course.

I have honestly endeavored to inform myself as to what is the best course to pursue. It has been difficult because the source from which full information upon all angles of this question should emanate has seemed reluctant to enlighten us. That is to say, the President of the United States, who undoubtedly is possessed of all the influences and considerations which caused him to make his appeal last June for this moratorium, I regret to say, has failed to make them known to the American people or to their Representatives in Congress. He does not hesitate to ask the cooperation of Congress on this matter, but so far has not acquainted us with the underlying, impelling reasons in back of his proposal. Now let me amplify that statement. The President has sent a message to Congress, it is true, and the Committee on Ways and Means has heard representatives of the State and Treasury Departments, but I have seen nothing adduced thus far to show why we must forego the debts owing to us in order to save Germany. The sum due us from Germany is but $6,000,000.

Of course, we would forego that or a far larger sum, because we all want to see Germany restored to a state of prosperity, but why must we forego the debts due from the other countries? Their treasuries may be and are no doubt depleted, France excepted, but so is ours. Have we any information that our debtors are unable to pay without their reparation payments from Germany? If so, I have not seen it. We are not concerned with reparations. It is our debtors who are, and from a pecuniary standpoint it is they who should be rescuing Germany from financial collapse, not us. We have not been told that they must be excused from their debts to us in order that Germany might in turn be excused from reparations payments to them. If we acknowledge that to be true, if Germany for any cause should fail to fulfill her reparations obligations, we lay the basis by the precedent we would establish for our debtor nations to take the position that their financial programs are so inextricably tied in with reparations that they must be relieved wholly or in part from their war debts to us. This result we must guard against, and I am not satisfied that we have sufficient information or assurances that such a situation might not come about.

It must be borne in mind that the President made his proposal last June, six months ago, and that during the interim he has communicated through his Secretary of State and his Secretary of the Treasury with all of these debtor nations, as both of these officials were in Europe much of the time since last June, and further the authorized representatives of both France and Italy have recently visited the President here in Washington. It would seem that the President should be in a position to give Congress more information than he has imparted so far as to why we must bear the brunt of relieving Germany, when Germany owes us at this time relatively a negligible amount. As for me it is not sufficient for the President to state, as he did in his message:

> As we approach the New Year it is clear that a number of governments indebted to us will be unable to meet further payments to us in full pending recovery in their economic life. It is useless to blind ourselves to an obvious fact. Therefore it will be necessary in some cases to make still further temporary adjustments.

Mr. Chairman, if that statement means anything it imports that soon another moratorium will be requested by the President, and ultimately we will be confronted with debt cancellation. At this time there may be no intention of a formal or official cancellation of the war debts owing to us by European governments; I do not know, and I dare say that there is not a single Member of either branch of Congress who knows. But what is the difference between an official cancellation and a continued deferment of maturing obligations? No one capable of thinking can reach any other conclusion, from what we hear from all sides, than that soon another request for a further moratorium will be advocated, and thus the march toward cancellation by the moratorium route, which will be just as effective as a declaration by Congress.

I contend that the people of this Nation, and especially Congress, are entitled to know just what governments are unable to pay installments upon their debts to this country and why. I should think in the light of all that has been said that we are entitled to the fullest information, especially if we are expected to cooperate with him. All he says is that—

> As we approach the new year it is clear that a number of governments indebted to us will be unable to meet further payments to us in full pending recovery in their economic life.

And so forth.

Moreover, it will be remembered that the President in his message asked for the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission with authority to examine into such problems as might arise in connection with these debts during the present economic emergency, and to report to Congress its conclusions and recommendations.

Just what did the President have in mind when he made this recommendation? Was it to prepare for another moratorium? Or was it to pave the way for a readjustment of these debts? Or was it to find that these debts could not or would not be paid and a recommendation made that they be canceled? These are questions that need to be answered. I want to know the answers, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of the constituency I have the honor to represent.

During the debate on the League of Nations there was much said about this Government avoiding all foreign entanglements. That has been a great slogan ever since. Following that theory, why is it necessary for this Government to concern itself with the payment of German reparations to other foreign countries? This Government did not exact reparations from Germany and does not receive any, and it is none of the business of the United States as to what arrangements may be made among these European countries about the payment of reparations. What these debtor nations owe us should not in any manner be affected by the payment of German reparations to those countries.

The resolution, which has been introduced just as prepared by the Treasury Department, provides that no agreement shall be made with the government of any country unless it appears to the satisfaction of the President that such government has made or has given satisfactory assurances of willingness and readiness to make with the government of each of the other countries indebted to such country in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts an agreement in respect of such debt substantially similar to the agreement authorized by the joint resolution which has been introduced to be made with the government of such creditor country on behalf of the United States. Boiled down, it means that those countries collecting reparations must agree to forego the collection of such reparations or the United States will not agree to enter into this agreement of a moratorium. It has been decreed that Germany must pay to certain nations reparations—in other words, war damages. These same nations, recipients of these reparations, are to pay the United States money borrowed from us, which is in no manner connected with or related to reparations and should not be based upon the payment of reparations to other countries.

It seems that it might be a pertinent question at this time to ask just why do these debtor nations find it is so distressing at this time to meet their payments to this Nation. This certainly can not be an unfair question in the face of the undisputed record of the amounts each of such nations has expended for armaments. It will be interesting as well as informative to show just what these debtor nations have expended within the past year on armaments as compared with their installments due on their debts, which it is proposed to defer. The armament figures in the following table were compiled by the War Department.

Country	For armaments	For debt to United States
Belgium	$23,247,347	$7,950,000
Czechoslovakia	41,056,000	3,000,000
France	547,133,935	50,000,000
Great Britian	608,024,880	159,520,000
Italy	322,337,000	14,706,000
Poland	122,995,000	7,486,000
Rumania	67,061,000	800,000
Yugoslavia	47,491,000	250,000
Total	1,779,346,162	243,712,000

Thus it can be seen that these debtor nations expended more than seven times as much for armaments during 1930 than their debt payments, which we are asked to permit to be postponed.

Even Germany has done her part toward armaments. In 1927 she expended $164,050,000; in 1928, $167,356,000; in 1929, $167,654,000; last year, or in 1930, $173,319,000.

There is much more that might be said on this question, especially in view of the repeated efforts on the part of the United States to bring about an agreement with these nations for further disarmament.

In the face of the expenditure by these debtor nations of over $2,000,000,000 annually for armaments, the question naturally arises if this huge outlay is not the sole cause of the present demand that they be relieved from the payment of less than a quarter of a billion dollars due us at this time. One way in which we might ascertain this fact would be to submit the matter to the Geneva disarmament conference which convenes on February 2. It could be ascertained there whether or not these nations intend to continue increasing their armaments. The pending resolution could be deferred until then. These debtor nations are in default now, so I see no occasion for hasty action.

Believing as I do that this is only the beginning of the scaling down of war debts owing this country, before voting for this resolution I want to know whether or not such scaling down would mean that it would give these countries just that much more to expend for armaments, to be financed, in effect, by an additional tax upon the American people.

My information is that there is not one of the European debtor nations that faces a deficit as great as does this Nation at the present time, but that does not make any difference with some people, as shown by the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee on this moratorium resolution. It is a case of taking the position from now on, as has been done to a very great extent in the past, that there should be no limit to the generosity of big-hearted Uncle Sam.

I was very much interested in an article by Garet Garrett in which he said, the morning after Mr. Hoover had declared a moratorium, the diplomats and chancelleries of Europe were saying on typewritten slips or in interviews that it was a grand thing, and the American correspondents were quoting them by cable, but that what these diplomats were really thinking and saying was very different. What were they saying? They were saying that "This is the beginning of the end of our hateful war debts to the United States Treasury. Uncle Shylock has been insisting that German reparations have nothing whatever to do with our war debts to America. But now he admits that if we can not collect reparations from Germany neither can we pay our war debts to the United States. That principle is implicit in the debt-holiday plan, since it includes both German reparations and our war debts to the American Treasury in one scheme of relief. Moreover, it is admitted that Germany can not pay reparations unless she can continue to borrow American money to pay them with. So either America must go on lending Germany the money to pay us reparations or cancel our debts to the American Treasury."

This fact we just as well might face, and that is that there is a general feeling throughout this Nation that thousands of small investors in the United States have been swindled out of hundreds of millions of dollars by being induced by American bankers to buy German bonds and other German securities which are now worthless. These same American investors are opposed to being further penalized by having to be taxed to meet the debts due us from these European countries to make more secure the investments of these same bankers in Germany. This may be considered by some as demagogic. Be that as it may, it is a fact and can not be denied.

In view of what I have already said, and much more I could say if time permitted, I have a feeling at this time that there is much more back of this proposed moratorium than mere assistance to Germany, and the more I see and hear the more convinced I am of the fact that it is the first move for debt cancellation. The bonded indebtedness of foreign nations to the United States on June 30 last was $11,466,028,562. This sum is drawing various rates of interest and is payable over a long period of years. Including interest when the entire debt shall have been liquidated, we will have been paid a total sum of more than $22,000,000,000. This would go far toward liquidating the public debt of the United States, which on July 31 last was upward of $16,000,000,000.

The cancellation of the $11,000,000,000 in principal owing us would mean shifting from European to American taxpayers the entire burden of liquidating our public debt. The benefit of this cancellation would be confined practically to international bankers having loans and other investments in the debtor countries amounting to billions of dollars.

I do not believe that the American people are ready to have their representatives in Congress vote for a proposition that may lead to a shifting of this burden from European to American shoulders. I will proceed on that theory in taking the position I expect to take on the pending moratorium resolution. I repeat that these debtor nations are now in default, the Treasury Department to the contrary notwithstanding. If the Secretary of the Treasury can assume the authority of postponing these payments to a future date—that is, until this resolution is passed by both branches of Congress—there is nothing to prevent him from postponing the date until after the Geneva disarmament conference in February, after which, if the right spirit be manifested, the moratorium with a provision for a very substantial curtailment by these debtor nations of expenditures for military and naval establishments could then be considered.

I am thoroughly convinced that when these nations, along with the United States, declare a holiday on expenditures for armaments, then, and not until then, it will be time for this Nation to consider a holiday on the payment of their debts to us. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the committee, in order that Congress may become more familiar with the project I will offer some facts relative to the proposed transfer of Blackbeard Island, McIntosh County, Ga., from the United States to the county of McIntosh, in Georgia. This island was at one time the property of the State of Georgia, but was ceded to the Government more than a century ago when the Nation had need of it for the use of the timber in constructing ships and for the future use of the Navy. The county commissioners of McIntosh County have passed resolutions asking that this transfer be granted, and the Legislature of the State of Georgia has memorialized Congress to urge the transfer.

Since 1799 this island has been buffeted about among the various departments of the Government, serving no purpose, and certainly failing to benefit the public in any way. The purpose of the proposed transfer, to effect which I have introduced a bill, is to establish Blackbeard Island as a year-around resort to be used by the public and to be operated without profit. McIntosh County is to hold the island in custody for the people of the State of Georgia and the commissioners of McIntosh County are to administer the affairs of the proposed resort.

It is not contemplated that the county shall ever have the right to sell the island or any portion of it. They may lease certain parts, but only for restricted rentals, and not for profits other than those necessary to maintain the island. The resort is specifically intended for those people who are not financially able to afford the luxuries of the elaborate pleasure resorts along the Georgia coast and who, in spite of its proximity, have no access to the beneficial recreation of this coastal region.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. What is the distance from the mainland to this island?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. It is 12 miles from Darien, the county seat of McIntosh County, at the opening of the sound, the name of which I do not have. The original deed that is on record in the Treasury Department does not give the name of the sound.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. I have never visited the island, but, as I understand it, it is the first island north of St. Simons Island?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. It is; and it is in close proximity to Sapelo Island.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. And it would be easily accessible to the people on the mainland?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. It would, as well as the people on the other islands.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. What is the size of the island and what body of water surrounds it?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. It comprises about 1,600 acres. I can not tell you the waters, because the sound there is not named in the original deed.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. The Atlantic Ocean is on the east side, and there is a marsh between the island and the mainland, as I understand it.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Yes; and it is a very short distance from Sapelo.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. And a public road could be built from the mainland across that marsh to the island, which would make it very accessible to the mainland.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Yes.

A brief résumé of the history of the island under Government ownership will adequately prove its failure to be of any benefit to the Government of the United States at the present.

On February 25, 1799, an act was approved by Congress to purchase the island for its timber, to be used in shipbuilding and for the future use of the Navy. The purchase was consummated in 1800. It is a well-known fact that at this period of our history the live-oak timbers of the Georgia coast were considered the best material for shipbuilding available. The frames and the wooden armor of the warship "Old Ironsides" were cut from St. Simons Island, near Blackbeard. The timbers for the first ships of the American Navy were cut from the live oaks of the Georgia coast, and Capt. John Barry, who was commissioned by the Government to find suitable timber, after searching over the Atlantic coast for suitable wood for the Navy's first vessels, made this report to the Secretary of War concerning the live oaks of the Georgia coast:

> The building of frigates of live oak will certainly be a great saving to the United States, as we are well satisfied (accidents excepted) that their frames will be perfectly sound half a century hence * * * we are fully convinced from experience that if they were to be built of the best white oak in America their durability at the utmost would not exceed one-fourth of that time * * *.

Captain Barry's committee made this report in 1794 and it was only natural that the Government should attempt to secure permanent possession of a near-by island that was bounteously supplied with such excellent timber.

When the Government needed Blackbeard Island in order to have at its command this splendid timber, the State of Georgia and McIntosh County patriotically ceded it to the Government, and it has had the full use of this island with all of its natural resources for more than 131 years. Now, when the Government no longer has need for this property, and when it has long since outgrown its period of usefulness to the Federal Government, these citizens ask that it be returned to them in order that they may embark on another patriotic venture with this small island; that of developing it into a resort for the thousands of citizens who are unable to afford the pleasures of the privately owned properties along the coast.

During the middle years of the nineteenth century this island was used as the South Atlantic quarantine station but this usage was later abandoned, the island not proving worth while for this purpose.

President Harrison in 1889—September 27—by Executive order transferred Blackbeard from the Navy Department to the Treasury Department.

In 1914 President Wilson, by Executive order, designated this island as a preserve and breeding ground for native birds, subject to the use of the island by the Treasury Department should the need ever arise. This order was vacated in 1915 and the island was restored to its former status to be administered under the Treasury Department.

The State of Georgia was given the custody of the wild life on Blackbeard in 1916 and it remained under the State's protection until 1922 when the custody was transferred to Mr. Howard E. Coffin, who owns Sapelo, an adjoining island.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. I will state that history shows that the Georgia coast was called Florida by the Spaniards for several hundred years, and the early stories written about the beautiful scenery of Florida were written about the coast of Georgia before the Spaniards conceded that it really belonged to the English Government.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. That is true, and I am coming to that just a little later.

In 1924 the island was transferred to the Department of Agriculture for its use as a bird reserve. Pursuant to this order the Bureau of Biological Survey of the Department of Agriculture assumed jurisdiction and immediately thereafter leased the oyster beds and other privileges to Mr. Howard Coffin for $25 a year, and placed the entire property in his charge as deputy reservation protector.

Blackbeard Island, together with other naval lands no longer useful, was listed and its disposition authorized by act of Congress in 1926. In order to prevent this disposition the island was again transferred September 20, 1926, to the Department of Agriculture for use as a bird refuge and as an experiment station for the acclimatization of certain foreign game birds. The island is now administered under the Bureau of Biological Survey and Mr. Howard E. Coffin holds the lease for the fee of $25 per year.

This is the brief history of the island and it is evident that it has served no useful purpose for any length of time in the entire history of its ownership by the Government.

In urging that this property be returned to its original owners, the people of the State of Georgia, I am not unmindful of the fact that objection might be raised because of its value as a refuge for birds. This island has little value for this purpose however, and McIntosh County offers to supply the same protection to the wild life of the island that it now enjoys.

To demonstrate the greater need for this island as a place for people rather than as a place for birds, I shall quote from an authority on wild life in that section, Mr. O. Hopkins, of Crescent, Ga. This man is recognized as such and was keeper of the island during the administration of the Hon. Sam Slate as fish and game commissioner. Mr. Hopkins is authority for the statement that Blackbeard Island has no distinctive value whatever as a game refuge, that few birds ever nest there, because the island is unprotected from winds and because of the ravages of wild animals. He further states that during 10 years of close observation he has not seen on Blackbeard Island any birds that he has not also seen on other islands and on the near-by mainland. Mr.

Hopkins also is emphatic in his statement that better protection could be given to the wild life on Blackbeard Island, including deer and wild duck, than is given under Federal control. At present this type of game suffers greatly from "poachers."

Under the jurisdiction of McIntosh County adequate protection would be assured the wild life of the island, and thousands of people would receive the pleasures and benefits of a healthful seashore resort who are now being denied this privilege. The beach on this island is one of the best on the South Atlantic coast, extending 7 miles and offering an unexcelled place for swimming and water sports. It is but 12 miles from Darien, the county seat of McIntosh County, and it will be easily accessible to the thousands of people residing in the interior of Georgia who will greatly benefit by the proposed resort.

It is true that in the past there have been a few privileged individuals, who were in favor of those in control, who have had access to the island and regaled themselves there. These parties by a few favored individuals are common knowledge, but the pleasures of a few should in no way stand in the way of the enjoyment of the thousands who would be able to benefit by vacations at a health-giving watering place such as Blackbeard Island.

In short, there is one question for this body to decide: Whether or not a fine, public-spirited enterprise for the benefit of thousands may be established by the patriotic citizens of McIntosh County or whether it is to be continued as a useless Government project for the exploitation of a few favored individuals?

Early in the history of the State of Georgia there were numerous publicly owned islands along the Georgia coast, and these were wonderfully provided by nature as resorts for her people; but in the course of the years all of these islands, except Blackbeard have passed into the hands of individuals and are now privately owned. Such beautiful watering places as those of St. Simons, Tybee, Wilmington, Sapeloe, St. Catherines, Doughboy, Cumberland, and Jeckle have gotten into the possession of the few, and the many have thereby been deprived of their use except on the terms of their owners. Blackbeard Island, now owned by the United States Government, offers for the masses of the people of this section a veritable seaside paradise, and the passage of this bill to transfer its title to McIntosh County will make this paradise available to the people who are now deprived of its use.

The citizens of McIntosh who have undertaken this enterprise have proved themselves worthy of this patriotic enterprise by nearly two centuries of unselfish service. The forebears of the citizens who are making this petition were brought to the lower part of the colony of Georgia for the express purpose of serving as a buffer to the Spanish settlements in Florida, and from the time of the Battle of Bloody Marsh, on St. Simons Island, when the English under General Oglethorpe defeated the Spanish and rendered Georgia safe for English colonists, on through all wars of this Republic the citizens of this section have always faithfully dischaged their duty to their country.

They are eminently worthy to establish this resort and to faithfully manage it without profit to themselves for the benefit of the people of this section, who would otherwise be denied this blessing of nature. It is not a selfish or unworthy motive that prompts these people to seek this island, but one of altruistic purpose to make available to the masses this wonderful seashore with its attendant benefits.

There are many privately owned beaches where the wealthy and influential can take their families for vacations, but there are none for the working people and for those of average means of this section, and it is for their benefit that I ask that this bill be passed. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD to include the following:

DECEMBER 16, 1930.

Resolution

Whereas the Chamber of Commerce of McIntosh County, a civic organization recently organized by the citizens of this county, is sponsoring a movement to have Blackbeard Island, now owned by the United States, transferred to the county of McIntosh for the purpose of the establishment thereon of a great public-owned beach resort; and

Whereas the Chamber of Commerce of McIntosh County did, on December 11, 1930, address a communication to our Senators and Congressman, the Hons. WILLIAM J. HARRIS, WALTER F. GEORGE, and CHARLES G. EDWARDS, outlining in detail the plan for the aforesaid public-owned development, copy of which letter is hereto attached and made a part of this resolution: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the county commissioners of McIntosh County, Ga., ever anxious to exploit the great natural resources of our State and county and solicitous for the health, happiness, and general welfare of our people, do hereby most heartily indorse and approve the movement and plan for the establishment of the aforesaid public-owned beach resort on Blackbeard Island; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Chamber of Commerce of McIntosh County, and to the Hon. WILLIAM J. HARRIS, WALTER F. GEORGE, and CHARLES G. EDWARDS.

A resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to transfer Blackbeard Island, to be used as a resort

Whereas Blackbeard Island comprising about 1,600 acres, located in McIntosh County, Ga., was acquired by the United States in 1799, for the purpose of using the timber thereon for building wooden ships; and

Whereas it has not been used by the United States for many years for any practical purpose and is of no value, good, or service to the United States or any citizen thereof in its present condition; and

Whereas it has a beach about 7 miles long on the Atlantic Ocean, and the same is capable of being developed into one of the finest summer resorts in the Nation; and

Whereas there will be introduced in the Congress at the next session a bill to authorize the United States to transfer to McIntosh County, Ga., the said island to be used as a summer resort; Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Georgia (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States and the Congress thereof are respectfully urged to transfer said island.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the National House of Representatives, the two Senators, and the Members of Congress from Georgia.

This is copy of Georgia House Resolution No. 42, read and adopted January 29, 1931, introduced by Atwood, of McIntosh; Beasley, of Tatnall; Howard, of Long; McWhorter, of Oglethorpe; Davis, of Mitchell.

H. R. 6264

A bill to convey by a quitclaim deed from the United States of America to the county of McIntosh in the first congressional district of the State of Georgia a certain island known as Blackbeard

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to convey by a quitclaim deed from the United States of America to the county of McIntosh in the first congressional district of the State of Georgia, that certain island lying and being in the county of McIntosh in the first congressional district and in the State of Georgia at the entrance into Sound and known by the name of Blackbeard, containing about 1,600 acres, more or less.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, a great many routine matters which the House must take up necessarily take up considerable time. It was that I had in mind when I urged that we get down to business and dispose immediately of as many of these routine matters as we possibly could.

Personally, I feel that we could have disposed of the moratorium in a few days. We could have designated the old members of the Ways and Means Committee as a special committee. I feel that we could have disposed of the first deficiency bill before Christmas, which, in all likelihood, will take several days when we come back after the holidays. All precious time wasted.

One can not unduly stress the economic conditions in the country. I am greatly concerned and worried about it.

We are not going to get out of this depression or relieve the unemployment situation by "pep" talks given by the distinguished gentleman from the Department of Commerce, the bedtime story-teller of the administration, Dr. Julius Klein. He may tell bedtime stories and talk over the radio every night, but it will not move a bushel of wheat or put one man to work. [Applause.] In fact, I would designate Dr. Julius Klein as the Baron Munchausen of the administration. [Laughter and applause.]

Now I am very often confronted, and properly so, with the direct question from my colleagues, "Well, LAGUARDIA, what are you going to do about it?" "Have you got a program?" We must have a program! This depression has cost billions of dollars in the depreciated value of securities and property and billions of dollars in the loss of wages. It will take billions of dollars to put this country back on a working basis. A costly depression requiring a huge amount of money to overcome. Mere palliatives will not do; a major operation is necessary.

A few days ago—Saturday, I think—the House was engaged on a bill which we passed, splendid in its title, most ineffective in its substance. It was a bill entitled something or other for the relief of the farmers—a hundred million dollars to relieve the farmers—and yet I venture to say it will not afford relief to a single, solitary farmer. The bill should have been called, instead of a bill for the relief of the farmers of $100,000,000, "A bill for the redemption of depreciated bonds." They say it was necessary. I do not doubt that it was necessary. But let us be frank about it. It will not bring much benefit to the unfortunate, suffering farmers of the country. [Applause.] We must get the farmer out of debt and not put him in the hole more than he is.

I will not review the details of that bill at this time.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. DIES. In view of the present attitude, what would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am coming to that. That is a fair question. I submit that my solution perhaps may not solve the problem; my suggestions may not fully cover the situation; but I say this, that at least we should ventilate our ideas here. We must have a full and frank exchange of views. We should study the various bills on relief and get the committees working on them. We ought to agree on a program of economic relief. One thing I want to press upon you is that the entire financial structure of the world has collapsed; the present economic system is not adequate to meet the industrial age in which we are living, and it may be necessary to go into the very fundamentals of our system and bring about an economic readjustment.

I do not want to shock my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, Doctor BECK [laughter], whom I see here, ready as always to raise constitutional objections to plans offered to meet our present deplorable conditions.

First, of course, immediate relief for the unemployed this winter is necessary. Private agencies are doing all that they can, if you please, but we have gotten beyond the situation where private relief and private charity can take care of the distress existing throughout the country. Unless we do something we are going to have serious trouble in this country, and we may have barricades. If we have serious trouble in this country it is not going to come from the professional agitators, it will not come from the extreme radicals, because they are in a small minority; it will come from the hundreds of thousands of good Americans, graduates of high schools and colleges, skilled workers, small business men, and professional men and women who have an intelligent understanding of economics and who simply resent going on the bread line and seeing their families in want. [Applause.] There is where your trouble will come from. Therefore I would suggest now—and I do not care what you call it—immediate, substantial appropriations by the Federal Government to supplement State and local appropriations to carry us through this winter. I admit that will not solve our problem permanently, but the situation is so bad that unfortunately such relief is necessary. Many of you will remember the discussions had on the Arkansas situation last session. We can not apply old constitutional construction to an instrument adopted when we were a small country, with plenty of land, with no real individual want, and no multimillionaires and no monopolistic control of industry and finances, when the telegraph was unknown and the steam railroad had not been invented, when there was practically no machinery at all. You can not apply constitutional limitations adopted in those days to meet the machanical and industrial age in which we are living. The Constitution must necessarily be construed in the light of the day in which we are living. I am glad the distinguished majority floor leader is here. He has a great deal of vision, has always had, and courage also. I am glad that he holds the responsible position that he does hold, and I refer to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

I hope that he for one will not be of the kind that becomes "unduly conservative" with responsibility. Ah, Mr. RAINEY, this is no time for ultraconservatism; this is a time for drastic action of a constructive nature, of course. We must first appropriate a substantial amount to supplement State and local appropriations to carry us through the winter, and in the meantime we must adopt a real building program that will put hundreds of thousands of men to work immediately and not a few or a dozen draftsmen working on a blue print. We can not feed workers on a blue print. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] and others have introduced a most extensive road-building program. We must go into a road-building program on an enormous scale, or it will not be effective at all. Though we may not need all these new roads immediately, we surely will need them in the future. Therefore, it will not be waste of funds. It would not be a waste at all, but we ought to map out a network of transcontinental roads running east and west, north and south of sufficient width to care for the needs of all future growth of population and increased traffic and build them in different sections simultaneously, so that all sections of the country would be able to supply immediate work to their local unemployed. If we could put hundreds of thousands of men to work all over the country, we would thereby bring up to that extent at least the purchasing power of the American people and indirectly help agriculture as well as industry. Yes, gentlemen, a real program will cost enormous amounts of money—it may run into billions—but the saving of our country is worth more than all of that.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In a moment. The next point I would suggest is that the Federal Government appropriate sufficient money to loan to municipalities for the construction of 500 aviation fields for commercial purposes.

Aviation is the coming system of transportation, and to my mind it is better now in its infancy that we provide for municipal terminals rather than permit a monopoly to be created in this new method of transportation. By appropriating sufficient funds to loan to municipalities, covered by bonds on each particular field of sufficient length of time, we could create here a network of aviation fields over the country necessary in the very near future, create immediate employment so much needed, and that will not require a great deal of engineering in the necessary preparation. This expenditure, too, would repay for itself, as I have suggested. It has been suggested to me that we should not repeat the mistakes we made in the past when railroading was in its infancy, for which mistakes we are now paying; and if you do not believe that, look at the depreciated value of railroad securities at this moment. Let us at least profit by the terrible mistakes of the past in regard to railroading, now that we have aviation to build up.

I would convert all appropriations for cruisers and battleships that have not yet been commenced into appropriations for merchant ships, and I will tell you why. As our merchant marine act is now being administered, we are not doing anything substantial to increase our foreign commerce or to increase the efficiency of our merchant marine. We are simply helping a few existing companies. By providing new ships, which, of course, would serve as auxilaries to the Navy in any emergency, we would provide new and modern tonnage for our merchant marine, and these ships could be given in lieu of cash loans. I wonder how many of the gentlemen present know that we are giving a subsidy to steamship companies controlling and operating ships under foreign flags. Under the guise of being agents of foreign companies or owning subsidiary companies, millions of dollars are paid to companies ostensibly engaged in solely American shipping. The very purpose and scheme of ship subsidy is to permit an American merchant marine to enter into competition with foreign ships, and here we are turning over public funds to companies who themselves operate ships under foreign registry. They get it coming and going. Every foreign ship they so operate, naturally, is manned by a foreign crew.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. To be exactly fair, the gentleman from New York made that statement in the press. Was it not denied? I am not defending the Shipping Board. I would join in almost any criticism the gentleman lodges against them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If they were to pile up all of the Bibles in the world right here on this table, and they would take an oath and deny it, I would still make the statement. Here are the facts. There is the merger of the International Mecantile Marine Co.; the Roosevelt Co.; the Dollar Line; the Red Star Line—get that, a Belgian company, operating ships under the Belgian flag—the Atlantic Transport Co., a British company; agents for the White Star Line, a British company; then there is the Munson Line, operating Norwegian ships; and only a few days ago we gave a postal contract, which is a ship subsidy, and loaned $2,000,000 to the Seatrain Transportation Co., a Canadian company, owning one ship, built in England, flying the British flag. I am going into that matter very thoroughly on another day.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has done what I desired him to do, and that was to reiterate the truth of these charges that he has been making in public.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thank the gentleman, and I stand by every word that I said, and the record will bear me out. I shall not go into that any further, because I want to continue my suggestions for what they may be worth.

In our building-construction program, in order to make it serve the purpose of an emergency measure, to provide employment, we must necessarily build such structures as would not ordinarily be required. Otherwise, you have no emergency program. We should carry on to the fullest extent.

Now, at the risk of further shocking some of my conservative friends and, perhaps, outraging constitutional limitations, gentlemen, we must find some constructive plan to take care of future emergencies, to guarantee economic security to the workers of this country. I say the only way to do it is to establish a national system of unemployment insurance. Call it a dole, if you want to. Stigmatize it, if you can, but just as the old constitutional lawyers criticized the employers' liability law, just as the old conservatives criticized the old-age pension plan, because of the industrial machine age and the speed at which we are going, the production is such that we can not possibly absorb the man power that we have in the country. We must distribute this cost in a manner that will make industry take care of such periods, by guaranteeing unemployment insurance. Just a few pennies each week from every employee and from every employer, with the cost of administration carried by the Federal Government, and we can build up such a reserve fund as will guarantee this economic security which is necessary to the peaceful continuance of our Government. [Applause.]

We have the experience of other countries. You all remember the recent election that was held in England with the dole as the issue. The opponents of the dole were victorious, but they have not repealed that law, nor can they repeal it. Criticize the British dole as much as you want; but if they did not have unemployment insurance in England, which was commenced in 1910, when conditions came on so fast that it was impossible to build up the necessary reserve, you would not have a British Government to-day. I urge the immediate study of unemployment insurance by the appropriate committee of the House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York 10 additional minutes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I am in sympathy with the purpose of the gentleman, and I think the gentleman is outlining a very good program, but there is the question of getting the money to build the roads and the aviation fields. It will take a large amount of money. Has not this Government, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] said the other day, about reached its borrowing limit?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am glad the gentleman brought that up. It is a fair question, absolutely. It was the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] in a well-thought-out statement, because every remark which the gentleman from Massachusetts makes is very thoughtfully and carefully made—I say it was the gentleman from Massachusetts who stated on Saturday when he talked about the insurance companies and the banks that the wealth of this country is owned by the great masses of the country. The gentleman is in error. That is not quite correct. It was correct at one time, when the country was young, but, gentlemen, I say that 80 per cent of the wealth of this country is owned by 5 per cent of its citizens; and such a condition is unwholesome in any republic. [Applause.]

How are we going to get the money? I will tell the gentleman how we will get the money according to my plan—the only way that government can get money—by taxation. Revenue-producing improvements would, of course, be financed by bonds on a proper amortization basis, such as roads and aviation fields. It is easy to sit here and vote appropriations and then go home and tell what you have done; but with that is carried the responsibility of having the backbone to sit here and vote taxation, and I for one now declare that I am willing to vote for increased taxes, and we shall be compelled to do it in the present session of Congress.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman from New York. I, too, am in favor of taxation rather than the sale of bonds, because the bonds have to be met by taxes subsequently, sooner or later.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it fair, I submit, to permit future generations to pay for the mistakes of this generation? This depression is our mistake. This depression is our blunder, and it is unfair and unjust to pass the cost of it on to the next generation. I say it is our blunder. Time does not permit me to go into the details or an analysis of what happened. You have heard it, I believe, in the Ways and Means Committee. You will hear of it when considering the tax bill. It was the result of financial recklessness, a betrayal of trust on the part of financiers who should have protected their investors but who went into this orgy of mergers, bond issues, and underwriting, reaped their commissions, and left the public holding the bag. The very people who trusted them were their dupes. That is what happened. [Applause.]

Then, gentlemen, the next thing after the unemployment insurance is this: We must so arrange our conditions as to give the benefit of machinery and the blessings of improved methods of production to all of the people and not to a few who happen to own the machines. There is not a manufacturer in this country in time of depression that would turn his horses and cattle loose and not feed them until business picked up, but that same employer will tell his employees at the end of the week, "Come back when we call you." That same employer would not abandon his machinery. He will keep it well housed, protected with fire insurance and burglary insurance, keep it oiled in order to keep it in good condition, but he does not care a snap of his fingers what happens to the human beings that make that machinery and operate that machinery and who create his wealth.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not yet.

Gentlemen, such a speech might have been considered radical only five years ago, but conditions have so happened that verify every word I say and emphasize the necessity of meeting the situation.

We must therefore start with the 5-day week. How can the Government do it? I concede we can not legislate that because of our limited powers under the Constitution, but we can start in this way: First, place all Government contracts for materials, for supplies, for ships, and for buildings on a 5-day-week basis. Legislate the railroads on a 5-day-week basis. Close the Federal reserve banks, the post offices, and Government offices on Saturday; use the power of taxation or grant a benefit to employers who go on a 5-day basis.

Gentlemen, if we can reduce the working week from six days to five days, under the present production of the country, we can put 2,500,000 men at work. You say, Where will it come from? From the industries, of course. Just part of the overhead cost of production. The prosperity of the country is not necessarily measured by the stock ticker. The prosperity of this country is measured by the number of happy homes with workers in them earning sufficient money to live up to the American standard and to give their children a happy and wholesome childhood. That is the American standard and that is the test of our country's prosperity.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman really think those profits exist? I know they existed a few years ago and they should have been taxed heavily, but that is water over the dam. Does the gentleman think industry is making those profits now?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It works in a circle. We must simply bring the standard up and profits will go up under such conditions. If we increase the wage-earning purchasing power we increase the price level. The trouble is that while we brought up the prices in the industrial centers the earnings went down in the agricultural centers, and now what some of the conservatives are trying to do is to bring the standard of the industrial centers down to a new low level. What we must do is to bring the standard of the agricultural centers up and maintain the normal standard (before the depression) in the industrial centers, thereby giving them an opportunity to buy our goods and we in turn will be able to buy sufficient food to take care of the people in the cities. That is all there is to that.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. ANDRESEN. If we should adopt the 5-day week what would the gentleman do with the present scale of wages for those who are now employed?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That will adjust itself. The first thing to do is to get men at work and then the next thing to do is to bring the standard of wages up to the American standard.

I will tell you what I mean when I speak about the American standard. I mean what we talk about when we have the tariff under discussion here. That is what I mean. I want to translate the much-talked-of American standard into something permanently real.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. I agree with what the gentleman says about bringing agriculture up to the standard with industry, but how can you lift agriculture up by increasing taxation and public expenses? I come from an agricultural people and my observation is that there is no greater burden on agriculture to-day than taxation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The increased taxes that I and I am sure the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] have in mind would not affect the people on the farms in Kansas or Iowa or Oklahoma. The old measure of taxation was to spread taxes where they could be best borne, but the new theory is to make the people who derive the greatest benefit of government bear their proportionate share of the cost of government. You take enormous companies like the United States Steel and the Standard Oil and see what they cost the Government. They get a greater benefit out of the Government, and they should bear their proportionate share. There is talk about the little fellows in the cities getting $1,500 or $2,000. They pay more than their proportionate share of the cost of government through indirect taxes, in rent, in food, in clothing, and other excise taxes. The small business man and the salaried folks are paying more than their just share of taxes now. Let us be frank. Congress must tax wealth, not only for revenue but as a social measure to prevent the concentration of wealth in a few families.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. What effect does the gentleman feel that increased Federal taxes, a 5-day week in industry, and so on, would have upon agriculture in so far as the purchase of the commodities which agriculture must have in its production is concerned? What effect would it have? Would it tend to increase the farmer's cost of production?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It would increase the farmer's cost of production and would increase the price level.

Mr. BURTNESS. If the cost of production were increased, he would be worse off than now, unless he can get an increased price level which will more than offset his increased cost of production. How are you going to bring that about?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That will necessarily follow.

Mr. BURTNESS. We have seen the farmer's cost of production go down and the prices on his products go down, so that increased prices have not necessarily equalized the increased cost of production.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We are talking about the falling of prices, and yet with the depression in this country we have surpluses. This is the only country in the world that has a depression and yet has surpluses, a most paradoxical situation.

Why, gentlemen, unless there is a curb—unless we do force changed conditions to reestablish employment, which reflects immediately on the prosperity of the farmers, we will destroy entirely the American farmer. They are now being drained to pay interest on mortgages and debts. If this continues, they will become miserable tenant peasants—mere industrial slaves. So it is with industry, commerce, and property. The longer present depressed conditions continue the poorer the people will become and the rich will become richer by buying everything at the present depressed prices.

I say if we do increase the purchasing power, if we do give the people of the industrial centers the means to properly provide for their families, the price situation of the farmers will be taken care of; but the gentleman from North Dakota has been giving a great deal of study to this question, and I understand he is coming before the House with a bill to fix these price levels; but we must fix the price levels up and not down.

Mr. BURTNESS. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman on that, but I happen to be one of those who believe that improvement will come as between industry and agriculture as a shoulder-to-shoulder proposition and that one can not particularly improve without the other.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is true; absolutely.

Mr. BURTNESS. They must go hand in hand, and thus rehabilitated, the purchasing power of both the people engaged in industry and the farmers who must buy the products of industry will be increased.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly, and you will find all thinking people of the industrial centers will cooperate with you.

But, gentlemen, the appeal I want to make to-day is that we get busy real quick and get our committees working, so that we can give the very serious thought that the very serious condition of this country demands of Congress at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE].

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, picture if you will the condition of this country had one and two-thirds million immigrants been admitted to the United States during the last fiscal year. According to reports of American consular officers there was during the last fiscal year an estimated demand for 1,695,284 immigration visas in the 67 quota countries. Every one of these intending immigrants was a potential wage earner. Upon being admitted to the United States many of them would have taken jobs from American workmen, and the rest would have been dependents or objects of charity.

What actually did happen? Let us examine the immigration records for the last fiscal year.

For the first time since the Civil War the net fiscal gain in population through immigration of foreigners into the United States has been less than 100,000. In the year just closed, only 97,000 immigrant aliens were admitted to this country, and during the same period of time 61,800 departed. In other words, there was a net gain of only 35,200 immigrants during the last fiscal year.

In his annual message to Congress President Hoover deals with the subject in a masterful way. Congress should promptly enact into law the recommendations he makes. He said in part—

> That immigration restriction now in force by administrative action be placed upon a more definite basis by law.

Tne President is entitled to credit for the decrease in immigration during the past year and for preventing by the reduction of immigration an increase in the number of unemployed in our midst.

Friends of restriction in the last Congress failed to agree upon a definite plan of further reduction of immigration. In the meantime many of the nations of the world were in the throes of a depression. The United States was the last to be seriously affected. The demand for immigration visas mounted until there were, according to reports received by the Department of State estimating the number, nearly 2,000,000 aliens who wished to come to the United States, while the quota under the immigration act of 1924 was 153,744 per year.

Many immigrants were admissible without regard to the quota, such as the unmarried child under 21 years of age, or the wife of a citizen of the United States, or the husband of a citizen of the United States by a marriage occurring prior to June 1, 1928. Furthermore, those born in Mexico, Canada, and the other countries of the Western Hemisphere were not restricted by a quota. Consequently American officials were confronted with the demands of a vast number of aliens who wished to come to the United States for work. This great number included both those who could come in outside the quota, and those who were admissible under the quota.

The President realized the seriousness of the situation and saw what might result if American citizens were compelled to compete with these aliens. Since no action was taken by Congress to restrict immigration further and thereby protect the American standard of living, the President proceeded to act. He found the means in the 1917 basic immigration act. That act excludes from the United States physically, mentally, and morally unfit aliens, and it also provides that no alien is admissible who is "likely to become a public charge." This latter provision applies to all immigrants except near relatives. Then the immigration act of 1924 places the burden of proof upon the alien to establish that he is not likely to become a public charge.

On September 8, 1930, President Hoover instructed the members of the American Consular Service—the consuls issue immigration visas—to enforce the immigration laws and refuse a visa to any alien wishing to come to the United States who was "likely to become a public charge."

Under this Executive order American consuls, ably assisted by technical advisers of the Department of Labor, issued immigration visas, keeping in mind the economic conditions in the United States. As a result of the order of the President, there was a very considerable decrease in the issuance of visas. For the four months through July, August, September, and October, 1930, the number admitted was 59,873, while during the succeeding eight months to the end of the fiscal year the number was only 37,266. Because of the fact, however, that immigration visas are good for four months after issued, and many visas had been issued before the date of the Executive order, the decline in admissions at first was not so noticeable. A great proportion of the 97,139 immigrants admitted during the fiscal year 1930–31 were nonquota immigrants—members of families of American citizens and other persons less likely to come here in competition with wage earners.

This reason for denying immigration visas is temporary. When America picks up in industry, the prospective immigrant may rightfully claim he can get work and therefore will not be likely to become a public charge. This fact the President no doubt had in mind when he stated in his message:

I recommend that immigration restriction now in force under administrative effort be placed on a more definite basis by law.

The time has come when America should select those persons of specific trades actually needed here. Why should we admit 100 bricklayers into the United States when we are more than amply supplied with that class of skilled labor? The same applies to machinists and men in the other skilled trades.

We should likewise place Mexico, Canada, and other countries of the Western Hemisphere on a quota basis, so that the whole world will be restricted.

The President also makes this recommendation:

The deportation laws should be strengthened.

The Labor Department last year expelled by warrant proceedings 18,142 aliens, an increase of 1,511 over the number expelled during the preceding year. In addition there were 11,719 aliens who were permitted to depart voluntarily without any or with incomplete warrant proceedings. In every deportation case the alien is given his day in court and has the right to be represented by counsel and to appeal.

As the President suggests, however, the law should be strengthened by amendment. Those who violate our narcotic laws are now deportable. Alien bootleggers, racketeers, in fact, many classes of criminals, are not affected by the present deportation law. Those who commit crimes involving moral turpitude, which is defined as an act of baseness, villainy, or depravity in defiance of the social duty man owes his fellow man, are deportable.

The alien who is repeatedly convicted of violating the laws of the United States or of the several States, for which a total imprisonment of one year or more for the various offenses may be imposed, should be deported. Likewise, membership in any organization which has as one of its objects the destruction of this Government by force, should be sufficient ground for deportation.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. CABLE. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Would it not be good to deport a criminal alien when he is convicted instead of waiting until he has served his sentence? Why should this country board him? Would it not be better to send him out of the country as soon as he is convicted?

Mr. CABLE. Deportation proceedings are not intended as punishment. Therefore, I believe the alien should first serve out his sentence before being deported.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. DIES. I am impressed with the remark and agree with him. Does not the gentleman think, in view of the tremendous number of unemployed and the difficulty of absorbing the surplus, we should be justified in suspending all immigration for five years?

Mr. CABLE. The President's order of September 8, 1930, was in effect a practical suspension of immigration, excepting near relatives. This, however, is a temporary remedy; when conditions improve, the reason for refusing the immigration visa will disappear. Instead of a 5-year suspension, I suggest that the nationals of all countries not absolutely barred from coming be placed on a selective basis, and only those skilled in a particular line be admitted in event there is not a sufficient number of such trade in the United States. Let the United States make the selection of newcomers.

The President also made this recommendation: "Aliens lawfully in the country should be protected by the issuance of a certificate of residence."

I commend the President for this recommendation. If placed on our statute books it would strengthen our restrictive immigration laws, in that many aliens who might wish to enter unlawfully and in defiance of our laws would not come because without such certificates of residence they could easily be detected and deported. Likewise, the alien temporarily admitted would leave at the end of his lawful stay.

President Coolidge made such a recommendation, as did President Harding. The present law—namely, the act of March 2, 1929—provides for the voluntary registration of those aliens who wish to regularize their unrecorded entry into this country, and is applicable to all entries up to and including June 3, 1921. Then, there is the provision of the 1924 act providing for the registration of all aliens who have entered since July 1, 1924. The gap in the law between 1921 and 1924 might well be cared for by extending the law so that all persons in the United States lawfully must obtain certificates of residence. This would leave the alien who had entered illegally or who came lawfully and remained after the allotted time to be registered. Not being eligible, a registration law would bring about his voluntary departure or being easily discoverable, by lack of a certificate showing lawful residence, he would become subject to deportation.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman think any foreigners would want to come to the United States hoping to find employment?

Mr. CABLE. Certainly. There are thousands of aliens who have applied for admission but being likely to become public charges, under the President's order, they are not granted immigration visas and, therefore, are barred from coming.

The Department of State advises that on July 1, 1931, the estimated demand for visas against the 69 quotas amounted to 1,363,565, and that even to-day, after the American consuls have required the aliens to file their applications a second time, there are still 226,159 pending applications for immigration visas.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. I yield.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Hoover should be commended for his attitude on immigration. I shall support any measure along that line. But does the gentleman not think that some measure should be adopted to enable us to prevent the employer employing aliens when the employer has reasonable grounds to believe that they are here unlawfully?

Mr. CABLE. That is exactly in line with the President's suggestion that a law should be passed protecting the aliens lawfully in the country by issuing "certificates of residence." No employer in America would wish to give a job to an alien illegally here. I call attention to an article in the New York Times yesterday showing that the increase in the number naturalized has resulted from the fact that neither the State nor Federal Government will permit an alien to take a civil-service examination or carry on many of the professions.

The same thing would apply to a law requiring certificates of residence. It would protect both the alien lawfully here and the American workman.

President Hoover's policy on immigration and deportation, expressed in his annual message to Congress, is truly American and should promptly be enacted into law and made permanent.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that the Mapes fiscal affairs committee, of which I had the honor to be an humble member, had completed its labors when the report was accepted and sent to the Senate, and that we were relieved from further duties.

But in justice to a gentleman who has written me—President Noyes, of the Associated Press—I desire to incorporate his letter in the RECORD, and before doing so to make a brief statement.

Mr. Chairman, I am in receipt of this letter, which I understand is sent by Mr. Noyes, president of the Evening Star Newspaper Co., in which he says:

> In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, yesterday's proceedings, you identify repeatedly the editor of the Star with the president of the Associated Press. * * * It so happens that my elder brother, Theodore W. Noyes, is, and has been for many years, the editor of the Star. He has no connection with the Associated Press, and I am not the editor of the Star, though I am the president of the Evening Star Newspaper Co., and as such responsible for its general business conduct, but with no control whatever over its editorial policy.

The statement of the president of the Associated Press, who is also president of the Evening Star Newspaper Co., will be accepted by everyone as true. He is an eminent gentleman, who would make no misstatement, and although responsible for the general business conduct of the Star, he writes in substance he is not responsible for its news policy, that sometimes quotes only half truths, as I will briefly point out. He is not, I assume, responsible for cartoons lampooning Members of Congress for not meeting the Star's tax views. He states specifically he is not responsible for editorials that are severely critical of opinions by Congressmen that differ from its editor's.

As to half truths, possibly unintentional, when the Star recently editorially quoted Minneapolis tax assessments at 40 per cent, which is the Minnesota law requirement, it failed in the same editorial to state that the tax rate for Minneapolis, as appears on the same page of the committee report, has for the last five years averaged 73 per cent, or more than four times the tax rate of $1.70 that applied to the District, and that the taxes paid in Minneapolis are found by the committee on adjusted valuations and rates to be 70 per cent higher than the tax paid in Washington. This error or omission is not in any way related to the duties of the president of the Star Co. His correction of that inference is received.

Nor is the president of the Star Co. responsible for repeated Star charges of injustice of taxation rates because Washington has no representation in Congress. The 500 pages of committee hearings failed to disclose a single witness from the Star or from other witnesses examined asking for such representation or for any proposed amendment to the Constitution to permit Washington to control its city affairs, which under the Constitution must now be handled by Congress. This cry always raised at tax times with Congress and serves to arouse District residents over some supposed injustice.

When the Star lampoons Congress in cartoons and makes Chairman MAPES, a conscientious man of absolute fairness, to be a tax-squeezing official, it is evident from the letter received that President Noyes, of that company, is in no way responsible, yet it was a natural mistake for anyone to make. Nor were these important facts to consider. The taxes paid by the Washington Star compared with those paid by other companies in other cities is the only proper basis for comparison.

The committee findings show that the District of Columbia should raise $14,000,000 District funds annually to equal taxes paid by 22 comparable cities. President Noyes, of the Evening Star Newspaper Co., and his company are direct beneficiaries of any undertaxation in the District if that finding is true. When Milwaukee, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh, and Baltimore papers are found to pay approximately 70 per cent more tax than President Noyes and his Star Co. now pay, then such facts found by the committee are relevant.

When the members of the Boston press pay 85 per cent more tax than President Noyes of the Star pays for his company he is certainly a direct beneficiary of the low tax rates here. When Louisville, New Jersey, and other papers, according to the committee, pay approximately 100 per cent more tax than President Noyes's paper is paying, certainly that is a proper subject for comment. These rates are found by the committee in 22 comparable cities with Washington at $15.30 per thousand at the foot of the list. I submit when President Noyes of the Star pays one-half of 1 per cent on intangibles, a far less rate than is found elsewhere in the country, so far as the committee learned, then it becomes an important proper subject for argument.

I do not know that it is material whether the president or the editorial writer of the Star is critical of the action of the House that adopted the tax report of the committee. The real issue relates to the actual taxes paid by the Star Co. compared with taxes paid in 22 comparable cities.

When President Noyes, of the Star, with possibly 50 or more cars and trucks belonging to his company, pays only $1 license fee and a nominal personal-property tax of two or three dollars, while the cars of all States pay on the average from about $15 to $20, or in the proposed bill $14 each, I submit that is fair to consider by all the States which pay $9,500,000 district subsidy and several times the auto tax paid in Washington.

When President Noyes, of the Star, pays a 2-cent gasoline tax for his company's 50 or more cars and trucks—I do not know the number—and the District assessor reports that $1,200,000 more is needed for the maintenance of Washington streets than is received from the present tax as shown by the committee report, it is proper to ask why the Federal Treasury should be called upon to pay this excess in cost for pavements and streets of Washington and why the 4-cent tax of the average State is not proper to pay in Washington.

I repeat, I have the highest respect personally for the distinguished president of the Associated Press, who is also president of the Evening Star Newspaper Co., and according to his own letter is responsible for the general business conduct of the Star Co. It is as such business man in control of the Star's taxation matters that I tried to draw comparisons to which his letter refers.

President Noyes's statement that he is in no way responsible for the editorials, news items, and cartoons in the Star lampooning Congress when discussing Members of the legislative body is also accepted unquestionably as true. It explains, however, a surprise to those who know that the business policy of the Star is necessarily closely connected with taxes paid. In fact, the Star editor may not be expected to have that knowledge.

I submit that the comparisons of taxes apart from the suggestion that President Noyes, of the Associated Press, has no connection with Star editorials were proper and necessarily drawn out by the attitude of the paper of which he is president and in control of its business affairs.

I congratulate him on his paper, the Star, and on his phenomenal business success and withdraw any statement, if made, that he writes the editorials. Any suggestion to that effect I regret, if made, but urge that it had no relation to the tax comparisons made properly from committee findings.

I have no controversy with the Star or its president or its editor. It would be useless to attempt to correct misstatements of fact by either. But is it good sportsmanship to treat those who have no personal interest at stake without attempted unfairness, and to that treatment the fiscal affairs committee is entitled. It has ceased its labors, a matter of satisfaction to every one of the members, and we leave the burden of tax matters to the regular committees that have to do with District affairs.

I ask to submit copy of the letter sent to me by Mr. Noyes, in justice to him and his dual position, which would not be known generally but for the letter.

It has no effect, however, so far as I can see, on the tax interest of the valuable Washington property of which he as president is naturally concerned.

Personally I extend full apology for any possible inference that he is the editor of the Star. He is its president, and if any injustice occurred through confusion in the field of work it is regretted.

DECEMBER 18, 1931.

HON. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FREAR: I have just read your speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD covering yesterday's proceedings.

In this speech you identify repeatedly the editor of the Star with the president of the Associated Press.

I trust that the other statements in your speech are more nearly accurate than this.

It so happens that my elder brother, Theodore W. Noyes, is and has been for many years the editor of the Star.

He has no connection with the Associated Press and I am not the editor of the Star, though I am the president of the Evening Star Newspaper Co., and as such responsible for its general business conduct, but with no control whatever over its editorial policy.

For your information I may say that I have never written or suggested a line of editorial criticism regarding legislation affecting the tax matters of the District, and in addition I wish to say that in the more than 30 years I have been president of the Associated Press I have never attempted to influence either House of Congress in any legislation, as I have felt that I could not properly do so as the head of a cooperative organization of more than 1,200 newspapers.

You will, I am sure, feel that your remarks of yesterday do serious injustice both to my brother in his field and to me in mine.

Very sincerely,

FRANK B. NOYES.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. DYER. I am sure the gentleman from Wisconsin, a member of the committee of which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] is chairman, and for which committee we have a very high regard for their splendid work in connection with the matters they have under consideration—but I am sure the gentleman does not intend to criticize one of the great newspapers of this city which has been for many years well known, honored, and respected——

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman ask his question?

Mr. DYER. I am coming to it. In view of the fact that 500,000 people in this city are taxed without representation, does not the gentleman think that the Star is properly carrying out its duty in passing opinion upon legislation?

Mr. FREAR. Let me in turn ask the gentleman a question. Does he concur in the criticism contained in articles and cartoons printed in the Evening Star that criticize members of the committee for what they honestly believe from the evidence to be the facts?

Mr. DYER. I have not noticed the cartoons. I do not read or look at them any more than I listen to the venomous talk by Members of the House about the President which is wholly unjustified in every respect.

Mr. FREAR. My purpose to-day is to correct that very inference. It is with the business manager, the president of the company, we are concerned. He is not related to the criticisms, according to his letter. He is, however, the proper official of the company to have charge of its tax matters, and as such I offered the comparisons.

Let me say, as I said before, Mr. Chairman, that I do not enter into any controversy with newspapers. There is not a man on this floor, if he would arise to defend a newspaper, no matter what its attitude may be, but would receive a complimentary notice from the newspaper. You can not have a controversy with a newspaper, nor do we attempt anything of the kind; but when we make fair statements in our report, having no interest in the result, and try to get the facts before the House, showing that $14,000,000 ought to be paid by this city, according to the finding of facts, more than is at present paid by the people of this city, we ought not be condemned, ridiculed, and cartooned for honest opinions based on the best evidence obtainable. I do not speak for myself alone, but more particularly for the chairman of the committee. He is a quiet, modest gentleman, a very able man. I am making this statement for him as well as for the committee, and also wish to enter this letter in the RECORD because Mr. Noyes is fairly entitled to it, and I am glad to put it in. Nor do I connect him in any way with the treatment accorded our committee by the paper of which he is the president.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD].

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I rise to speak briefly of a matter which affects my county particularly, and affects every principal highway in the great United States. I live in what I believe to be the greatest county in America, although I imagine every man in the room will disagree with me. I live in Westchester County, N. Y., and through that county runs two post roads, the Albany Post Road and the Boston Post Road, taking care of the main traffic through the State to Massachusetts, Connecticut, and the north. The extent of the growth of truck, freight-train, and motor-bus traffic on these highways has been brought to my attention, and the same thing applies to every principal highway generally in the United States. These truck freight trains are a great menace to the comfort, health, and safety of the people, and I would just briefly make a few statements and recommendations showing my investigation as to these motor-truck trains and busses. The effect on highway traffic is—

First. Residential property is being ruined by this traffic.

Second. Public health is seriously menaced by all-night noise and fumes.

Third. Passenger and ordinary automobile traffic are endangered and restricted by the size and speed of motor freight and passenger vehicles.

Fourth. Highways are being used and broken down by heavy freight trucks and passenger busses, without equitable contribution to cost and maintenance of the highways.

Fifth. Bus and freight traffic are constantly increasing and threaten to monopolize the highways.

Sixth. Bus and freight traffic are viciously conducted by reason of the lack of public regulation.

EFFECT ON TRANSPORTATION AND COMMERCE

First. The volume of motor-truck and passenger-bus traffic is rapidly increasing.

Second. The size of both freight and passenger vehicles is constantly increasing.

Third. The use of truck trailers is becoming more prevalent.

Fourth. That the use of such trailers is augmented by car loading and forwarding companies and by other freight carriers acting for them.

Fifth. The "truck and trailer" referred to in third and fourth is, to a large extent, the objectionable traffic.

Sixth. The committee has reason to believe that the motor freight traffic is, to a large extent, interstate traffic.

Seventh. The committee believes that this traffic is forced to the highways and motor trucks by inability of the railroads to reduce their less-than-carload rates to meet the rates of the common-carrier trucking companies, because the railroads are compelled by the interstate commerce act to extend reduced rates made to meet such competition to other territories and other traffic where such competition does not exist.

Eighth. The motor-freight and interstate passenger-bus traffic are largely diverted from the railroads on which such traffic properly belongs.

Ninth. Both the railroads and the motor-freight and bus-passenger carriers are essential to transportation, but are now being operated uneconomically in competition for limited classes of traffic, to the detriment of all concerned.

Tenth. Regulation of the motor carriers will eventually determine economically the kind of transportation which should prevail, and will result in the retirement of either the railroad or the motor carrier from the field in which it can not compete at the rates and furnish the services provided by the more efficient carrier.

RECOMMENDATIONS

First. That the transportation of persons and property for hire by motor vehicles on the public highways be subject to the jurisdiction and regulatory powers of State and Federal commissions.

Second. That the operation of motor vehicles upon the public highways for such transportation be prohibited unless a certificate of public necessity and convenience be obtained.

Third. That operators of motor vehicles for transportation for hire (by common carriers) on public highways be required to operate under public regulations similar to those imposed on railroads, and at least be required—

(a) To give full information concerning ownership, financial condition, equipment, including size, weight, and capacity of each vehicle, and the physical property of the operator.

(b) To designate the routes over which the carrier operates.

(c) To publish tariffs and file a stipulation to observe all rates, schedules, practices, and classifications stated in their published tariffs or prescribed by any commission.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLARD. Yes.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Is the gentleman ready to surrender the State rights over bus and truck travel to the Federal Government at the present time, or does he want the State to have something to say?

Mr. MILLARD. I want both the Federal Government and the State to have something to say.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Where would the gentleman draw the line?

Mr. MILLARD. That is difficult to say, and I am not very clear on that point.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Up to the present time the States have had regulation over bus and truck travel.

Mr. MILLARD. Yes.

Mr. ANDRESEN. And to a man who has the State's interest at heart, it would appear that the States should still retain control over bus regulation, except as to some interstate business.

Mr. MILLARD. That is exactly what I mean, surely.

Mr. BURTNESS. Would not the same principle apply with reference to truck and bus regulation as applies with reference to railroads and other carriers, and that is, permit the States to have control over purely intrastate traffic, and yield to the Federal Government the power to regulate the interstate traffic?

Mr. MILLARD. That is very true; but we have Federal aid on State roads, and I think there should be some Federal control.

Mr. KNUTSON. What difference is there between railroads and trucks and busses?

Mr. MILLARD. There is a great deal of difference. One runs on a rail and the others on the highway.

Mr. KNUTSON. I mean in principle.

Mr. MILLARD. Oh; I am not a railroad man.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, on the 14th of December the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], in discussing the moratorium, undertook to discuss two or three other matters. I was able to tell the gentleman from South Carolina that I expected to say something about what he had to say. However, the RECORD ought to show that he is not now on the floor, and I have not been able to tell him that I was going to speak at this time. If he cares to answer any of the questions I am asking, it should be understood that they are not being asked of him while he is sitting here. He mentioned cotton nightshirts, and he thought that probably we could improve the cotton situation if everybody would wear more cotton.

Then the gentleman said:

> But I say to you that this matter of the appointment of boards is one which is becoming nauseous to the people of the United States, because they see so many people elevated into positions of power and trust who do not carry out their trusts. For instance, take the Federal Farm Board that was created and appointed by the President. I do not say that the law is not all right. I voted for it. But the board that was appointed was a set of incompetents, and I do not hesitate to say so.

Then a paragraph about cotton, and then we find this:

> That is the kind of boards we have got.

As I understand the gentleman from South Carolina, he puts his stamp of approval upon the agricultural marketing act because of the fact that he had voted for it; but having voted for that act and brought it into creation and then having lost control over it as far as he is concerned, he undertakes to brand all of the members of the Farm Board as a group of incompetents and disapproves of the administration of the act.

I have undertaken to get a record of the men that have been appointed to the Farm Board during its existence. I would like to call the attention of the House to the qualifications of some of the men that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] brands as incompetents in the handling of farm problems. For instance, Mr. Teague, who came from California.

CHARLES COLLINS TEAGUE—RESIGNED

Principal business, horticulture; grower of lemons, oranges, and walnuts.

Other business: Cooperative—President California Fruit Growers' Exchange, president Fruit Growers' Supply Co., president California Walnut Growers' Exchange.

Commercial—Vice president First National Security Trust & Savings Bank, Los Angeles, Calif.; president Limoneira Co., Santa Paula, Calif.; president McKevett Corporation, Santa Paula, Calif.; president Teague-McKevett Co., Santa Paula, Calif.; president Farmers' Irrigation Co., Santa Paula, Calif.; president Santa Paula Water Works, Santa Paula, Calif.; president Thermal Belt Water Co., Santa Paula, Calif.; president California Orchard Co., Los Angeles, Calif.; vice president Salinas Land Co., Ventura, Calif.

Public and educational—Honorary degree, University of California; regent, University of California; vice president and director California State Chamber of Commerce; president California Agricultural Legislative Committee; member of Federal Farm Board, July 15, 1929, to March 6, 1931; vice chairman Federal Farm Board March 6 to present.

That is the record of one of the men that the gentleman from South Carolina brands as incompetent.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by setting out the various matters I have touched upon briefly in this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. One of the outstanding men that President Hoover called to the Farm Board was Alexander Legge. We of Nebraska got considerable credit and satisfaction out of the fact that two members of the Farm Board and the secretary of the Farm Board as originally set up came from our State. Mr. Legge, however, was born in Wisconsin. He started life as a farmer boy. He owns a farm in Nebraska. He came to the service of the Farm Board from the head of the International Harvester Co., a position that could not be filled by an incompetent. He returned to that same position. I would call the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina to the fact that Mr. Legge was vice chairman of the War Industries Board during the World War, and manager of the Allied Purchasing Commission, and again, Mr. Chairman, with the understanding that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] is not here, I would ask the gentleman if he intends now to tell the House that President Wilson and the Democratic Party, who had charge of administering World War activities, were placing incompetents in charge of those activities during that period?

Mr. Legge served during a trying time with the Farm Board. My judgment is that in his retiring from the board there was much regret on the part of the farmers of the United States, and he left with their complete friendship and respect.

Later on in the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] he refers to Governor McKelvie, a member of the Farm Board, who began his adult life as a member of the City Council of Lincoln. He was a member of the house of representatives of our State legislature; first, our lieutenant governor, then our governor. He was very active in developing cooperative farm activities in Nebraska and otherwise. He is editor of the Nebraska Farmer. He also is branded as an incompetent by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Then here is Mr. Wilson, who comes to the Farm Board from New York State, where he was professor of the New York State College of Agriculture at Cornell University from 1905 to 1915; State Commissioner of Agriculture for New York and director of New York experiment stations from 1915 to 1920. Member of the New York Fair Commission; president New York Horticultural Society; secretary Western New York Fruit Growers' Packing Association; trustee, Cornell University; and for a number of years a member of the State grange.

He, also, the gentleman from South Carolina brands as an incompetent.

Then, here is Mr. Schilling, a member of the Farm Board from the State of Minnesota; editor, newspaper man, in his early life. His principal business is that of dairy farmer; producer of purebred Holstein cattle for 30 years. He was president of the Minnesota State Dairymen's Association for three years; on the board of the Minnesota Farmers Institutes for three years.

For 11 years he was president of the Twin Cities Milk Producers' Association, doing $8,000,000 worth of business annually. He was a director for five years of the Land O' Lakes Creameries Co., selling 100,000,000 pounds of butter annually. He was a stockholder and officer in the Northfield Cooperative Creamery for 31 years; vice president and director of the Farmers' Elevators, Northfield and Dundas, Minn., for three years. He was president of the Cooperative Livestock Shipping Association, Northfield, Minn., for three years. The gentleman from South Carolina brands Mr. Schilling as an incompetent, while all of this shows that he has been one of the outstanding men in cooperative marketing in the United States.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not also a fact that Mr. Schilling, aside from having been a very successful dairyman, has been connected with cooperative organizations which, in the aggregate, did a business of perhaps $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 a year, and that his work in those organizations has been most highly commented upon by all of those who have had occasion to do business with him?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is my understanding that Mr. Schilling has been an outstanding leader in cooperative work during all the time of his adult life.

Mr. KNUTSON. A pioneer.

Mr. SIMMONS. And those who have been associated with him in this work are branded as incompetents along with Mr. Schilling because they have supported him in his work.

Mr. KNUTSON. What kind of a yardstick has been used to measure this board?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am coming to the yardstick that may have been used in arriving at the conclusion that all of these men are incompetents. May I say this: I have waited now for seven days for some man from the farm communities and on the Democratic side of the House to answer the general condemnation that the gentleman from South Carolina has voiced against the Farm Board, but not one of my colleagues on the Democratic side from the great agricultural regions of the country has cared to voice any protest as to what the gentleman from South Carolina said about the members of this board being incompetents.

Now, here is a man who, to my mind, is one of the outstanding men agriculturally in the United States. He is a member of the Federal Farm Board, yet the gentleman from South Carolina brands the entire Farm Board as a group of incompetents. May I now refer to Sam Thompson, a member of the Farm Board since April 30, 1931. He comes from Illinois. He was a member of the Adams County Farm Bureau in 1915. He was a member of its executive committee for eight years, and also served as its president. He was a member of the Illinois State Legislature. He was a charter member of the Illinois Agricultural Association; president of the Broadway National Bank in Quincy, Ill.; president of the Illinois Agricultural Association for two years; and, gentlemen, I ask you to get this: He was president of the American Farm Bureau Federation from 1925 until he became a member of the Farm Board. He is a man who for five years headed the American Farm Bureau Federation, one of the outstanding farm organizations of the United States. He was their leader, their spokesman, and as such he went to the Farm Board. Yet he is branded by our Democratic colleague as an incompetent, and for seven days that charge has stood and not a farm Representative on the Democratic side has challenged the statement that was made. In my judgment, when men like Sam Thompson are charged on the floor of this House as being incompetent, that charge goes to all the farmers who make up that great farm organization, for they have selected him, they have followed him and he is their spokesman.

Then there is Carl Williams, an agricultural journalist, editor of newspapers, secretary of the Scientific Farming Association, of Colorado, interested in farming and irrigation work. He was the organizer of the Oklahoma Cotton Growers' Association; director of the American Cotton Growers' Exchange; ex-president of the Southwest Wheat Growers' Association; ex-president of the American Agricultural Editors' Association; and ex-president of the national council, Farmers' Cooperative Marketing Association, as well as a former member and vice chairman of the United States Board of Mediation. That man is also branded by our Democratic colleague as an incompetent.

Then here is Mr. Stone, engaged in the tobacco-warehouse business in Louisville and Lexington, Ky., from 1899 to 1921; founder of the Burley Tobacco Growers' Cooperative Association in 1921, later becoming its president and general manager; director of the Fayette National Bank, Kentucky Joint-Stock Land Bank, Lexington, Ky., and chairman and tobacco representative of the Federal Farm Board from July 15, 1929, down to the present date, and present chairman of the board.

Here is Mr. Denman, who came to the board as a farmer from Missouri. He was a director of organization, Missouri Farm Bureau Federation, during 1921; president and director of the Producers' Livestock Commission Association, National Stockyards, Ill., January, 1922, to July, 1929; and president and director of the National Livestock Producers' Association, from January, 1925, to July, 1929. Yet that man, the representative of the cattle interests of the country, is branded by our colleague from South Carolina as an incompetent, and those charges, I take it, he applies to those who have supported this man and his work for the livestock interests.

Then here is Mr. Evans, who comes also from the ranks, beginning his official life as a county attorney in 1904, a State senator in 1915; a practicing lawyer for 29 years; secretary of the American Farm Bureau Federation in 1924; general counsel of the American Farm Bureau Federation in 1926; legal adviser for 10 years to cooperative associations handling poultry, dairy products, fruits and vegetables, and livestock.

There again a charge of incompetency is directed to a man who has been the legal adviser of the American Farm Bureau Federation and others for a number of years.

Now, the question has been asked, by what yardstick the gentleman from South Carolina judges as to who is competent and who is incompetent? I think possibly the answer can be found in a statement that I now have.

In view of the fact that he picked out the State of Nebraska, I have undertaken to find out just how much money has been loaned to the State of Nebraska by the Federal Farm Board and also to the State of South Carolina. I am proud to state to the membership of the House that the Farm Board had loaned to cooperative organizations in my State $1,089,115.19, and that my farmers have paid back to the Farm Board $634,004.12 of the money that has been loaned, or approximately 60 per cent of the money that has been advanced by the Farm Board to the cooperatives of my State has been paid back by these cooperatives to the Farm Board. This is the yardstick, if you want to know, as to what our farmers are doing with respect to these things.

So far as South Carolina is concerned, I find that the Federal Farm Board has loaned to the South Carolina Cotton Growers Cooperative Association of Columbia, S. C., $3,797,735.30; the South Carolina Packing Corporation, a cooperative of Fairfax, S. C., $67,470.41; the South Carolina Tobacco Marketing Association of Florence, S. C., $1,949,572.78, or a total loaned to the cooperatives of the State of South Carolina of $5,814,778.49.

I now suggest this question to the gentleman from South Carolina and the gentleman from Minnesota, who asked me by what yardstick the gentleman from South Carolina judges the Farm Board. Does his evidence of incompetency consist in the fact that the Farm Board has had confidence enough in the cooperative marketing organizations of the State of South Carolina to advance them almost $6,000,000? Is the fact that these loans have been made by the Farm Board to the farmers of South Carolina the basis of the charge of incompetency that the gentleman from South Carolina hurls at the Farm Board?

Now, if the evidence of incompetency on the part of the Farm Board, charged by the gentleman from South Carolina, is not in the fact that they have loaned the farmers of South Carolina almost $6,000,000—and I take it, it is not—possibly it is in this fact. The South Carolina Cotton Growers Cooperative Association received $3,797,735.39 in advances from the Farm Board, and they have not paid back one cent of it. Possibly the incompetency that the gentleman from South Carolina charges is in the fact that the Farm Board has not seen fit to compel the farmers of South Carolina to pay back any of these loans.

If the incompetency is not in making the loan, possibly the incompetency is in the fact they have not seen fit to collect the loan, and I say this: As between the farmers of South Carolina and the farmers of Nebraska, my people have paid back 60 per cent of that which has been loaned, and here is one great cooperative from the gentleman's State of South Carolina that has not paid back one cent, yet the men who made the advances are charged with being incompetents by the gentleman, and, possibly that transaction proves it, although I do not for one minute think so.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. I do not care to enter into a controversy as to the qualifications of the members of the Farm Board or other officials connected with it, but I would like the gentleman to tell me whether or not he thinks the present Farm Board act should be kept in force or repealed, if he does not mind going into that question at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very pleased to tell the gentleman that I think the Federal Farm Board act should not be repealed.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Does the gentleman think it should be amended?

Mr. SIMMONS. If we can strengthen it, yes; but, so far as the cooperative marketing activities of the Federal Farm Board are concerned, I think the record shows they have been a distinct benefit to the American farmer, and the fact that all the national farm organizations have taken the same position is fairly good evidence of that.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. I agree with the gentleman that the present Farm Board act should not be repealed, but I am very anxious to find out, if the gentleman has time now, what amendments he thinks should be made to the act in order to perfect it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not discussing the Farm Board act generally now. I am discussing these charges which were hurled at these men.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it a political question?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. I waited a week for some of you men who believe in this act, on your side of the House, to see fit to answer these charges.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further.

The gentleman from South Carolina further said:

Again, take the wheat business. When McKelvie, from Nebraska, who had never grown a bushel of wheat, who was one of these newspaper wheat editors, was appointed he put all the money, or a great deal of it, into cooperatives with which he was connected. They rigged up a lot of cooperatives to compete with the farmers' cooperatives, and instead of producer-owned cooperatives handling the wheat situation the newspaper farmers with their cooperatives handled it, and the thing has been a complete debacle.

The other day my friend, Mr. STRONG of Kansas, talked about the tariff on wheat and the tariff we must have on it. Why, gentlemen, as a matter of fact, under the administration of this beneficent Farm Board wheat is sold for less than the tariff on it.

That is the end of the quotations that I care to comment upon. I telegraphed that statement to Governor McKelvie, and I am going to read to you a part of his answer. If there is one place where men ought to be careful of their statements and facts, it is in debates on the floor of the House. Here is what Governor McKelvie said, leaving out several immaterial parts of his telegram:

We have produced wheat on our Nebraska farms for 50 years, and now have 1,000 bushels of wheat in the bin on one of our farms near Lincoln. I never have had any official connection with any cooperative, but have had membership in one, and for more than 20 years have consistently supported cooperative marketing through the columns of the Nebraska Farmer. The Farmers' National Grain Corporation, which the Federal Farm Board assisted in organizing, is a national cooperative grain marketing association wholly and solely owned by 25 State and regional cooperative grain marketing associations composed of grain producers. Its board of directors is composed solely of accredited representatives of producer owned and producer controlled organizations, the entire membership in which is producers of grain. The Farmers National Grain Corporation was organized voluntarily by farmer-owned cooperatives that existed when the marketing act was passed, and all such organizations were admitted to membership in it. These organizations wrote and adopted their own articles and by-laws, with the Federal Farm Board acting only in an advisory capacity. Membership in the Farmers' National enables grain growers in all parts of the United States to take unprejudiced advantage of its facilities. It is by far the largest grain concern in the United States, having purchased and handled in the two years of its existence more than 390,000,000 bushels of grain. Handling costs have been less than 1 cent per bushel, including a total cost for salaries and wages in all departments and branches of not to exceed one-fifth of 1 cent on all bushels bought, handled, and/or sold. Net earning of the corporation after setting aside necessary reserves represent a gain to organized grain producers of 2.3 cents per bushel, not including important benefits derived to all growers in narrowed margins and reduced discounts in the purchase of grain at both country and terminal points throughout the entire country. Loans to the cooperative of which I was a member before I became a member of the Federal Farm Board were made on grain in bonded warehouses and were repaid more than a year ago.

SAM R. MCKELVIE.

Mr. Chairman, at this point I ask unanimous consent to extend as a part of my remarks—and not take the time of the committee to read them—certain excerpts from three radio addresses by Mr. C. B. Steward, secretary of the Nebraska Farm Bureau Federation, and directly connected with the grain cooperative organizations in my State, operating under the marketing act, discussing the activities of the grain cooperatives under the Farm Board act in Nebraska.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

It has been plainly evident to the leaders in this cooperative movement that the producer had not yet fully reaped the advantages of cooperative marketing through localized regional associations. Just as the local farmers' cooperative association was only the beginning of the necessary steps by which the farmer was to control the marketing of the grain he produces, the regional was the next step in this development. But there was no coordination between the different regionals. The cooperative producer of grain was still a long ways from intelligent control of the distribution of his product. The various cooperatives were competing against each other for the favor of the buyers. Naturally, the buyers took advantage of the situation. In some instances the cooperatives formed upon the primary markets were only commission houses and these commission houses naturally had to turn the grain over when it reached them to private dealers who owned and controlled the terminal facilities so that the producer had no interest in the profits made in the course of processing and handling charges through the terminal elevators of the principal markets.

Upon the passage of the Federal farm marketing act and the creation of the Federal Farm Board the opportunity for the next step, that of the coordination of terminal facilities into a national set-up, was made possible. Very few people seem to realize that the major purpose of the Federal farm marketing act was to make it possible for the producer of agricultural products to organize and develop his own marketing machinery under the provisions of the cooperative law and that the principal function of the Farm Board is to carry out these provisions.

Accordingly Chairman Legge of the Federal Farm Board issued an invitation to the leaders of the various cooperative agencies of a State or regional nature to meet in Chicago for the purpose of developing a national marketing agency through which the marketing and distribution of the grain of the cooperative farmers might be efficiently carried on. These cooperative leaders met, and as a result of their work the Farmers National Grain Corporation became an established fact on October 29, 1929, and for the first time a nation-wide system through which the cooperative grain-handling agencies of this country could market its product was offered to the cooperative producer. Twenty-seven regional cooperative organizations own the stock of the Farmers National Grain Corporation. These regional cooperatives are made up of the local cooperative associations. The board of directors of the Farmers National Grain Corporation is elected by its stockholding members.

In order that the grain of the thousands of farmers who belong to the cooperatives may be merchandized in the best market possible the Farmers National has established branch agencies as active marketing units with modern facilities and experienced managers and salesmen upon all primary markets.

In addition to these the Farmers National has its special representatives at important exporting points, such as New York, Philadelphia, Norfolk, New Orleans, and Galveston. Through these sales agencies contacts are maintained with buyers in every leading grain-importing country of the world as well as the buyers of domestic grain in the United States. In order that the producer of grain might benefit to the fullest extent in this cooperative program it became necessary to secure control of the required physical machinery at the various terminal markets, and the Farmers National Grain Corporation now controls almost 57,000,000 bushels of terminal and subterminal elevator space either by direct ownership or by lease.

The enemies of cooperative marketing like to refer to this organization as another load upon the farmer's back. They must think farmers are very "dumb" not to know that the profits from the sale of their grain when handled by the private dealer always have carried this load, but the difference between the Farmers National and that of the private dealer is that the private dealer operates his grain business for profits for himself, and in order to do so endeavors to buy the producers' grain as cheaply as possible and sell it to the consumer as high as possible, while the Farmers National is owned, operated, and managed by producers and seeks to secure for the producer the highest possible price for his grain consistent with sound business practices.

The thing the farmer should remember is that in the acquiring of facilities which enables the Farmers National to operate its cooperative business and in the expense of merchandising through the employment of these experienced grain salesmen that this is all done from the earnings of the grain which the farmer never did receive. He receives the market price at his local point of delivery, and every other step in this national cooperative movement is being paid for from earnings and profits derived after it leaves the local point and without any direct expense to the farmer which he did not have to bear under the private system of operation.

The Farmers' National limits the dividend to 6 per cent upon its capital stock and all additional profits after the setting up of reasonable reserves are distributed back to the regional members in the form of patronage dividends. This cooperative movement organized by the cooperative grain producers with the help and advice of the Farm Board through the provisions of the Federal farm marketing act has brought to the producer of grain many advantages.

First. It has resulted in a more direct movement of the grain from the local point to the ultimate consumer.

Second. It has eliminated many duplications of service between the local producer and the final consumer or processor.

Third. It has reduced the handling costs and margins that must come out of the price paid to the producer.

Fourth. It has provided a sound financial basis for the cooperative handling of grain.

Fifth. With increasing control of volume it will minimize the disastrous effect of market gluts or seasonal congestions, thus insuring a more stabilized market level.

All of these advantages are reflected back in the form of a direct financial reward to the cooperative producer of grain.

In spite of the fact that the Farmers National had to set up its organization and acquire control of the necessary marketing machinery in order that it could function it has in the two years of its existence become the largest single handler of cash grain in the United States. It is paying back to the Federal Farm Board out of the earnings of its operation the money advanced by the board for the preliminary establishment of the corporation. It is using so far as available existing local sources of credit in the handling of its grain business and in a comparatively short time will have repaid all of its obligations under the Federal farm marketing act and will be financially independent in its marketing operations. But this would never have been possible had the way not been prepared first by the Capper-Volstead Cooperative Marketing Act of 1922, followed later by the Federal farm marketing act.

Any legitimate movement that will increase the income of the farmers of this State of Nebraska should receive the hearty support of all citizens of the State.

Twenty-five years ago the grain producers of Nebraska became dissatisfied with the grain-marketing machinery of the State. They felt that unfair practices existed in the matter of discounts and premiums and margins demanded by those who were engaged in the business of marketing their products. Naturally, their first point of contact with the marketing machinery for their grain was the local elevator. And so the farmers decided to secure control of their own local elevators through the organization of cooperative associations. Needless to say this movement met with the bitter opposition of private dealers, who saw in it a serious menace to the profits which they had been accustomed to enjoy. The private grain dealers of Nebraska, organized as the Nebraska Grain Dealers' Association, resorted to price fixing, boycotts, and every conceivable unfair method to stifle the development of these farmer elevators. The movement was sound and founded upon just principles, and in spite of the methods used to discredit the cooperative movement, the business gained support, and by 1926 we had approximately 400 of these farmer-owned elevators in Nebraska. Almost every grain-receiving station felt the influence of these farmer elevators. They brought within reasonable bounds the margins taken for the operation of the elevators and paid back profits based upon the volume delivered by the producer. An investment of $8,000,000 of farmers' money is represented in these cooperative elevators. The grain corporations that had been operating country-line houses as well as terminal elevators were forced to recognize the farmers' elevator movement, and in many instances disposed of their country elevators, recognizing the fact that if the farmer would originate the grain and private interests could handle it upon the terminal markets they would still control the business.

Leaders of cooperative marketing of grain made several efforts to organize cooperative terminal associations, but due to the lack of finances and the disorganized condition of farmers, these efforts proved fruitless. They were opposed in every instance by grain dealers' organizations who had unlimited funds and opportunity for publicity at their command. Being well organized they kept the farmers confused as to the purposes and objects of cooperative marketing in the terminal markets, and so were able to maintain their business. Then came the post-war depression and the serious situation in which agriculture was placed in its economic relationship with other business. After years of agitation the Federal farm marketing act was passed and the local cooperative movement was given an opportunity to expand through the organization of terminal agencies upon the primary markets.

The Federal farm marketing act created the Federal Farm Board and charged them with the duty of assisting farmers to organize their local associations through regional and national cooperative organizations for the handling of the commodities of their members. At a meeting attended by the representatives of these cooperatives proposed articles of incorporation and by-laws for the development of the organization now known as the Farmers Westcentral Grain Co. The stockholders of this terminal cooperative consist of farmers' elevators, and local cooperative marketing associations with a few individual grain growers who do not have the facilities of a cooperative organization. The business of the corporation is governed by a board of directors selected by districts. The districts were created in such a way as to give as nearly as possible equal representation based upon the amount of grain marketed from each district. The stockholding cooperatives of each district meet annually at some point within their district and select three members of the organization. Thus the control of the organization is brought as closely as possible to the local cooperatives who are owned by the individual farmers.

The board proceeded to establish an office in Omaha for the handling of their members' grain. Membership was purchased on the Omaha Grain Exchange and a competent grain man was employed as manager. The company operates just as any other grain company as a member of the Omaha Grain Exchange. In accordance with the plan as outlined by the Farmers Cooperative Association, the Farmers Westcentral became a stockholding member of the Farmers National Grain Corporation. The Farmers National Grain Corporation is owned by the regional cooperatives operating upon the different grain markets of the country. Its function is to centralize the control of the marketing of the grain of our cooperative members.

In the first year of its operation the Farmers Westcentral Grain Co. became one of the largest handlers of cash grain on the Omaha market and earned substantial dividends for its cooperative members. It handled approximately 8,000,000 bushels of its members' grain and brought to the cooperative elevator movement the realization of the fact that the local elevator is but the first step in cooperative marketing of grain. Through this organization the member of a local cooperative elevator retains his interest in the grain until it is finally sold by his national organization to the exporter or the domestic mill buyer. The cooperative farmer is becoming the owner of the terminal facilities necessary to effectively merchandise his grain, and he is securing the ownership through the earnings on his grain which he never did receive before.

The grain terminal elevators so necessary in the conduct of the grain business have been built out of the earnings of the farmers' grain but he never before had the opportunity of owning them after they had been built. The agitation that is emanating from the organized dealers in agricultural products against the cooperative movement finds its expression in opposition to the Federal farm marketing act. Naturally the business conducted by the Farmers Westcentral and the Farmers National Grain Corporation represents a loss of business to private dealers in grain and if we have found a method of marketing which will return more of the consumer's dollar to the man who produces the grain, that method will prevail as it has in every other line of business.

The Farmers Westcentral Grain Co. is not using Government funds in the conduct of its business. It differs from other private-owned grain companies only in the fact that its stockholders are the producers of the grain which it sells and that the profits derived from such operation revert back in the form of patronage dividends to the men who produce the grain.

Every dollar of the capital stock of the farmers' elevators of the Farmers Westcentral Grain Co. and the Farmers National Grain Corporation has been furnished by the farmers who have produced the grain.

The Farmers Westcentral Grain Co. and also the Farmers National Grain Coroporation, developed by the cooperative farmers themselves, were made possible by the assistance that the Farm Board was able to give the cooperative movement through the enactment of the Federal farm marketing act.

This morning I wish to discuss with you some of the other activities of the board which were authorized by the Federal farm marketing act and which were conducted at the request of the advisory committee for wheat which was organized under the provisions of the act and which requested action upon the part of the board because of the very grave emergency which confronted our market.

The Federal farm marketing act provides for the creation of a stabilization corporation for any commodity upon the recommendation of the advisory committee for that commodity if the board finds that the marketing situation with respect to the commodity requires such action in order to carry out the policy laid down in the Federal farm marketing act for the control of surpluses and to minimize speculation.

Because of the fact that the principal activity of the Federal Farm Board is to aid the farmers in the establishment of their own cooperative organizations for the efficient handling of their products, the enemies of cooperative marketing have assailed the Farm Board and sought to convince the farmer that the low prices prevailing in the market for his products are due to the activities of the board.

The Federal Farm Board was the only agency that was in a position to assist agriculture by stepping in and through its stabilization activity prevent a complete collapse of the wheat market, and it did that very thing. As a result of that operation the cooperative farmer members of the Farmers Westcentral Grain Co. delivered wheat to the extent of something over a million bushels at a price averaging 12 cents per bushel above the market, and the farmers of Nebraska received $143,000 more money for the grain delivered during that period than they would have received. Not only did the farmer benefit by this additional $143,000 but indirectly every business interest and bank in the State was benefited.

Again in the fall of 1930 another serious emergency arose. A panic in world markets resulted in a break of 6 cents per bushel in one day on wheat. But in that emergency the general manager of the Stabilization Corporation stepped into the Chicago wheat pit and took all grain offered at 81 cents per bushel for May delivery and thus prevented what promised to be a disastrous panic, which threatened the wheat producers of this country. Here again the Farm Board was adopting a policy that not only benefited agriculture but every other business interest. The break in the wheat market was largely due to the distressed selling by Russia of unexpected quantities of wheat in the world market with prices dropping sharply every day. The threatened break in price of our farm products seriously threatened the banking situation throughout the country. In one day 62 banks closed in a single Southwestern State. Banks in the Middle West had loaned money on nearly 50,000,000 bushels of wheat, which would have been forced upon the market at demoralized prices had not the Farm Board through the Stabilization Corporation prevented a complete collapse of Chicago prices in sympathy with the world market.

The situation was one that threatened the entire financial structure of our great wheat-growing section. Our wheat prices normally are slightly below Liverpool prices, and within a few days after the Stabilization Corporation entered the market upon the instructions of the Farm Board to buy whatever quantity of wheat was necessary to prevent prices going any lower for the remainder of the 1930 crop marketing year, the Liverpool price had dropped far below the American level.

I have endeavored to arrive at the value to the Nebraska farmers of this stabilization operation. I have a record of every carload of wheat loaded in the State of Nebraska during that period. I find that because of the action of the Farm Board in successfully preventing a break in the price of the 1930 crop of wheat through its stabilization operation that the farmers of Nebraska received $4,230,000 more for the wheat which they sold during that period than they would have received had they been forced to sell it upon a market controlled by the world price. Don't you think this four and one-quarter million dollars was of some benefit to other business interests of Nebraska? It increased the ability of the farmer by four and one-quarter millions of dollars to meet his obligations.

In view of the fact that those who have opposed cooperative marketing by their assaults upon the Farm Board have sought to convince the farmer that wheat would have sold higher if it were not for the Farm Board, let us analyze the price trend of some other important commodities with which the board had nothing to do. For example, when wheat sold in Chicago for 90 cents per bushel, crude oil was selling for $1.82 per barrel; copper, 17½ cents per pound. While wheat was dropping 50 per cent in price, crude oil dropped to 10 cents per barrel and copper ranged down from 5 cents to 7 cents per pound, and yet copper and oil represent two of our most highly organized and highly capitalized industries for amounts so large that the imagination can hardly grasp them.

Remember that oil has proration and other limitations of production because its production can be largely controlled by men independent of nature. The oil industry, with a working capital of two or three times larger than the total funds of the Farm Board, saw its commodity price drop from $1.82 per barrel down to 10 cents per barrel. The Farm Board, with a fund never over $500,000,000 to be distributed among some $12,000,000,000 worth of agricultural products, seemed to have done a much better job in its field than the management of the highly organized oil and copper industries.

Nebraska farmers should recognize the facts that have led to the low prices of our agricultural products and not be misled by the ruthless and unfair attacks made on the Farm Board. These critics of the Farm Board have never told the farmer that while American wheat was selling in Chicago at 49 cents per bushel, the Australian wheat farmer was delivering his wheat to China, freight and insurance paid, for 35 cents per bushel. They have failed to point out to the American farmer that since the creation of the Farm Board for the first time in the history of the grain trade Chicago grain prices ruled higher than Liverpool, Winnipeg, or Buenos Aires prices.

Agriculture, as well as all other business interests in this country, is faced with a condition that tests the courage and faith of farmers and the business men of America. All of us earnestly desire the return of normal economic conditions to the world and we are praying for the return of national prosperity. We, each of us, have a part to play in bringing about this return. We have vast national resources; we have the brain power to utilize these resources; we have the willing and capable labor necessary. No place are these three factors in more evidence than on the American farm. But the American farmer must have adequate organization for marketing his products that he may avail himself of the methods which have made possible our other large and successful industries. Cooperative marketing seems to be the only available remedy for the ills of the distribution situation which are affecting the farmer. By the passage of the marketing act, the Government has placed its stamp of approval upon cooperative marketing, and the Farm Board is earnestly, tirelessly, and faithfully devoting itself to the accomplishment of this purpose.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think it hardly fair to either side of the aisle to assume that a member who makes a speech on his own initiative speaks for any large group of the Members of the House, and especially is this true when a speech is made in reference to a matter not then pending before the House and where the party speaking makes no claim of authority to speak for others. I wish to say, speaking for myself, that I think the Farm Board has rendered a distinct service to a large number of the cotton growers in the South. In my judgment they have rendered a service in holding off the market the cotton on which the cooperatives borrowed money, and without the financial aid extended to these cooperatives by the board this cotton could not have been held for more orderly marketing.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the gentleman's statement is a correct one of principle. I don't undertake to charge a party with responsibility for what an individual member said, but under these circumstances, when a charge of this kind is made, directed at the membership of a Government agency and stands unrefuted, as it has for seven days, by any member of the gentleman's party, then I rather think that possibly the inference can be drawn that it has the approval of his side. I am glad to have it disclaimed as a party statement, in so far as the gentleman from Alabama has a right to disclaim it.

I refer now to the charge made by the gentleman from South Carolina that under the administration of the Farm Board wheat has been sold for less than the tariff upon it. The intent of that statement is that the Farm Board is responsible for the present low prices of wheat.

The figures I now want to leave with the House have been prepared by the Department of Agriculture. They are largely in detail. I asked for a statement of the wheat prices in Chicago, Winnipeg, and Liverpool before, during, and after the wheat stabilization activities of the Farm Board and the Grain Stabilization Corporation. I shall not take the time of the committee to read those statements in detail, if I may have unanimous consent to extend in my remarks this statement from the Department of Agriculture setting out the figures on which their conclusions are based.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to insert the data mentioned. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

WHEAT PRICES BEFORE, DURING, AND AFTER STABILIZATION OPERATIONS, UNDER AUTHORITY OF THE AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT, WITH COMPARISON OF LIVERPOOL, WINNIPEG, AND CHICAGO PRICES

In order to afford a better means of comparison the prices used in this statement are based on quotations for futures rather than on actual sales of cash wheat, in that cash prices, especially at Liverpool, vary widely, depending upon the quality and source of the wheat available at various times.

EMERGENCY STABILIZATION

While minor stabilization activities were operative at various times the major grain stabilization operations under authority of the agricultural marketing act extended from the middle of November, 1930, to the end of May, 1931—a period of approximately seven months. Prices during the first few days of this period advanced 7¾ cents at Chicago, with prices at Liverpool and Winnipeg following to approximately the same degree. During the month of December, 1930, prices at Chicago showed a further slight advance while the price at Liverpool from the latter part of November to the end of December declined nearly 18 cents per bushel and at Winnipeg nearly 16 cents per bushel. From January 1, 1931, to the end of May, 1931, the price of the May wheat future at Chicago was stabilized, with minor fluctuations, at an average closing price of 83½ cents per bushel, or 20⅛ cents over Liverpool May and 23⅞ cents over Winnipeg May. During this same period the average closing price of the Liverpool May wheat future was 63⅜ cents, and of the Winnipeg May future 59⅝ cents.

While the support given to the market by the Farm Board through the Grain Stabilization Corporation resulted in the average price of the Chicago May wheat future being maintained at an average of 20⅛ cents above the price of the corresponding future at Liverpool, the factor of transportation costs must be taken into consideration to show the full effect of stabilization operations. On the basis of the then prevailing rail and ocean freights and other costs the price of the Chicago future, under normal conditions favorable for exportation, would have been about 15 cents per bushel below Liverpool, whereas it was 20 cents over Liverpool. Giving proper consideration to these transportation costs, stabilization operations during this period of five months maintained the Chicago price at an average of 35 cents per bushel above a world parity. It is equally fair to assume, with the large world surplus of wheat, that wheat prices throughout the world would have been at even lower levels, if the enormous surplus of the United States, in the absence of stabilization, would have been pressed for sale on the world markets in active competition with the large surplus from other exporting countries.

Based on a 5-year average our farmers for the five months from January to May marketed around 125,000,000 bushels of wheat, with the Chicago price maintained at 35 cents above a world parity, the extra price received by our farmers on the wheat market during that period resulted in extra returns aggregating $43,000,000. Adding thereto the higher price received on the marketings from the middle of November, when active stabilization operations were begun, until the end of December, would increase the foregoing amount by 12 or 15 million dollars, making a conservative aggregate of $55,000,000.

PERIOD FROM JUNE 1, 1929, TO NOVEMBER 15, 1930

Early in 1929 it became evident that some form of agricultural-relief legislation would be enacted. This was immediately reflected in the narrowing of the spread in wheat prices between Chicago and Liverpool. The influence of the agricultural marketing act of June 15, 1929, in maintaining Chicago prices above a world parity was an important factor even before the major emergency stabilization operations were begun in November, 1930. For the period of 18½ months, from June 1, 1929, to November 15, 1930, the average spread in price, based on monthly averages of futures prices, between Chicago and Liverpool was only 7⅝ cents per bushel, making the Chicago price more than an average of 7 cents above a world parity. The average spread between Chicago and Liverpool futures for three years, 1926 to 1928, inclusive was 16⅜ cents per bushel.

PERIOD FROM JUNE 1, 1930, TO NOVEMBER 20, 1931

Following the discontinuance of active stabilization operations, but subject to the influence of the agricultural marketing act, Chicago prices have continued above a world parity. A comparison of average monthly futures prices shows the average Liverpool price at 61½ cents against 54⅞ cents at Chicago, an average spread of only 6⅝ cents, whereas the spread should be approximately 15 cents for an active export business.

While wheat prices declined irregularly for a period of more than two years, the price of futures at Chicago during the entire period, with the possible exception of a few days during July, 1930, were above a world parity. Roughly speaking, about 7 cents per bushel for 18 months prior to the active emergency stabilization operations begun the latter part of 1930, an average of about 35 cents per bushel from January to May, 1931, and an average of approximately 8 cents per bushel from June 1, to November 20, 1931. For the entire period of two and one-half years since June 1, 1929, Chicago wheat futures prices have averaged around 3 cents per bushel below the price of wheat futures at Liverpool, whereas during the three years 1926 to 1928, inclusive, Chicago wheat futures averaged 16⅜ cents per bushel below Liverpool futures.

The record is clear that not only has the Farm Board not contributed to the reduced price of wheat but the fact that the agricultural marketing act was contemplated, the fact that it was passed and put into operation and is still in existence, has materially benefited the wheat farmers of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that I have not heard all of the speech of the gentleman from Nebraska, but I shall have something to say about it to-morrow morning.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I shall not take five minutes, but at another time I hope to take a much longer time.

For 12 months past I have devoted my time to the study of the unemployment conditions in this country. I believe that at the present time there are available sufficient knowledge and sufficient data to enable a student, with the time at his command, to arrive at a reasonable opinion as to the basic causes of our present depression, and past depressions as well. And also to suggest, not only a temporary but a permanent cure, and a permanent prevention against the repetition of the depression that we are suffering at the present moment.

I do not pretend to know more than other Members here, but there is a mountain of information available in relation to panics, the depressions which follow them, the resultant unemployment, all leading inevitably toward the underlying causes of panics and depressions.

When I came to Congress and associated intimately with you gentlemen and with Members of the Senate, among whom are personal and intimate friends, I find there is a very great difference of opinion as to the cause of this difficulty. Not only that, but I find that no man, so far as I know, has set forth what is required to relieve the present situation and to prevent its recurrence hereafter.

I made up my mind that there is a great deal of information that ought to be gathered and that can be gathered in only one way, and that is by an investigation by a congressional committee. I have listened to speeches here for the past three weeks, and I am convinced that there is only one thing that ought to be done, and that is to carry on such an investigation.

We ought to have an investigation participated in by the Senate, because the Senate is as greatly in need of it as we are. That investigation will show conclusively the reasons why this depression exists.

It is for that reason that on the first day of this session I introduced into this House a resolution on this subject. After listening to a great many speeches and opinions, I have redrafted it and put it into this form. I will read it, for I understand if it is not read it will not go into the RECORD.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may insert the matter referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. I saw by the paper this morning that my good friend, Senator WALSH of Montana, was going to introduce a similar resolution in the Senate. I conferred with him, and we agreed that this identical concurrent resolution should be introduced by Mr. WALSH in the Senate and by me in the House.

We ask that a joint committee on the part of the House and on the part of the Senate, consisting of five Members appointed by the Vice President and five Members by the Speaker of the House, be appointed to investigate this subject.

I am calling attention to it at the present time because of its tremendous importance.

If we can get at the cause of this depression, we will understand what caused other depressions largely, although there is one important element that affects us at the present time that has not affected us heretofore. If we can arrive at a common knowledge and get an agreement as to the cause or causes of depressions, then we can prevent depressions, and we can not do it otherwise. If this House has full information before it, information carrying common conviction with it, we can get action here, because there is no question of the unanimity of opinion of the necessity for action and the willingness on the part of every man and woman in this body to carry out such remedies as that conviction shows to be necessary. Therefore, to my mind it is absolutely necessary that we shall carry on a thorough investigation enabling us to arrive at a definite conclusion, such conclusion as will itself suggest the remedies necessary. There is no mystery about panics. It is purely a question of getting the information in hand and looking the facts fairly in the face and of seeing who is profiting by panics and who is suffering by them, and of applying the remedy fearlessly and broadly down to the very fundamentals.

At another time I hope that this body may have time and that I may be given the opportunity to lay before you very specifically a broadgage plan for taking us out of our present depression and forever preventing depressions hereafter, and I believe that can be done. I thank you.

The matter above referred to is as follows:

House resolution authorizing the appointment of a special committee to investigate and report on the existing economic depression and remedies for relief therefrom.

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed and empowered to appoint a committee of five Representatives in Congress, which committee shall be charged with the duty to ascertain and report—

(1) Upon the causes of the existing economic depression.

(2) Upon such measures as should be adopted by Congress for relief from the existing economic depression.

(3) Upon such measures as should be adopted by Congress to prevent the recurrence in future of similar economic depressions.

House Concurrent Resolution

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), Whereas the country is suffering from the most profound industrial depression in its history, entailing enormous losses and widespread unemployment; and

Whereas many different causes have been assigned by economists, financiers, and other students of business and public affairs for the condition to which reference has been made; and

Whereas the condition referred to became generally evident after and was greatly intensified by the debacle on the New York Stock Exchange in the month of October, 1929; and

Whereas the sudden collapse of prices of securities dealt in on the said exchange was preceded by an extraordinary inflation in the prices of such securities and of loans through which transactions therein were effected, was accompanied by a tremendous contraction in bank credits and was followed by a rapid and continuing fall in the prices of commodities generally and particularly of agricultural products; and

Whereas measures to avert the recurrence of similar catastrophes and to alleviate the disastrous results of the existing crisis can be predicated only upon an accurate knowledge and appreciation of the causes giving rise to the same: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a joint committee, consisting of five Members of the House of Representatives and of five Members of the Senate be appointed, the House membership by the Speaker thereof, and the Senate Members by the Vice President, and that the said committee be, and it hereby is, authorized to inquire into the causes of the depression so existing, and particularly the relation of the collapse of prices of securities dealt in on the said stock exchange, to hear and take testimony concerning the means that should be employed and the legislation that should be enacted either to prevent a recurrence of such periods of depression or to lessen or reduce the malign effects thereof.

The said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper, and to require the attendance of witnesses by subpœnas or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents, and to employ stenographers, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to and sign subpœnas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee, or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation, shall be punished as prescribed by law. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $20,000, shall be paid, the one half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and one half from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I do not know whether I can answer the questions of the gentleman who has just spoken as to the causes of the depression in this country. But I do not consider that it is quite as difficult as most people believe it is. I do not think it is so mysterious or anything that is beyond our own comprehension. If you ask our friends, the international bankers, they will say: "Yes; it is very mysterious. It is very delicate. We do not know just what it is all about. It is something new to us. It has to do with foreign affairs. We know only one thing about it, and that is that we are blameless."

My friends, there is nothing new in this depression at all when you get down to the fundamentals. I favor the resolution urged by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER], but it does not go far enough. We should very properly create a joint committee of the House and Senate to investigate the causes of this depression and report back with constructive recommendations, if possible, establishing some kind of coordinated economic planning or reasonable equilibrium between supply and demand and an improved system of distribution of necessities of life. There is no reason why we should not strive for better economic stability for the future by investigation of the causes of the depression. The existing depression is exactly the same as all of the other panics and depressions we have had in this country for a hundred years past, but accentuated because of our industrial and machine age. It is because the American people went money mad; because, led on by the big bankers, they gambled and speculated and went on an orgy of extravagance. The big banks instead of remaining within their own proper functions of the banking business went into the security business and promoted mass securities, stocks and bonds, and sold them to widows and orphans and to everyone else, and, unfortunately, to some of the intelligent ladies and gentlemen of this House. The American people bought those stocks and bonds and generally assumed they were practically guaranteed by those big banks and the good names of those banks, who should not have had anything to do with the security business.

That is what caused more factories and mass overproduction. Every factory overproduced, until naturally we had an enormous inflation in 1929, which was bound to collapse sooner or later, and when it did collapse the pendulum swung back not only to normalcy but back into the depths of depression where we are to-day. That is the fundamental reason or reasons for the depression. I know Republicans like to use as an alibi that it is world-wide depression. That has something to do with it. The main reason is that our own people, led on by the banks, went on an orgy of speculation and gambling which caused mass overproduction in this country, and our banks and bankers are more to blame for the inflation and the resulting deflation than any other group of people or institutions.

Now that we are in the depths, it is right that we should try to find some means to get out of it and to get back to normalcy. It is perfectly proper, as the gentleman suggests, that the House and Senate should appoint a joint committee. My complaint about the situation to-day is that we have so far failed to appreciate the economic situation existing throughout our own country, the economic situation as it affects 120,000,000 American people and their property and their happiness. It is far more serious to the welfare of American citizens than at any time during the World War in 1918. At that time when the great war President called upon the Republicans for support, they gave their support unanimously to all war measures. I would remind the Members of the House that we spent in that war period of 18 months or 2 years, because we went on spending for a few months after the armistice, a total of $35,000,000,000. We raised most of that money through Liberty and Victory bonds, and some $10,000,000,000 through increased taxation. Of course, we did it to win the war, which was the main objective, and our objective to-day is to win out over the fearful depression which we are in. I can not see why we should hesitate to take immediate steps to afford all necessary relief, as the situation is far more serious to our people than the World War, which we fought on the other side, 3,000 miles away, against German autocracy and German militarism.

We did not hesitate to spend thirty-five billion, ten billion of which we loaned to the Allies, and to-day we hesitate to spend $1,000,000,000 or $2,000,000,000 to win our present war against depression. I say to you if it is necessary to raise two, three, or four billion dollars through Liberty loans or Victory loans at this time, we in Congress have that responsibility—and in my humble opinion it is far more necessary than it was during the World War—we should spend all the money that is required to prevent further economic disaster and provide for the employment and the welfare and best interests of the American people. We have already reduced our war debt by three billions more than required by law.

The fault I find with Congress is that after nine months of vacation we meet here the first week in December and we sit in this House for 10 days or two weeks and then we take a recess for two weeks, and all we have done is to vote for the moratorium to give up some money to Germany or to other foreign countries, and have done nothing for our own people. The only issue, the big issue before the country to-day, is unemployment, and the economic depression in the United States which affects every American home.

The unemployed must be fed and they must have not only food but fuel and clothing and housing. Yet we have not considered anything in the Congress which has any bearing on the plight of our own people. That is the main issue, and everyone in this House knows it and everyone in this country knows it also.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Can the gentleman from New York give us any reasonable assurance that the Republican administration, including the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, will give us any assistance in the program he is suggesting for the expansion of our national debt to meet the emergency he points out? Would it be possible for us to secure it without their approval?

Mr. FISH. I can not give the gentleman any assurance. My object in making this suggestion is that I think it is the duty of Congress to legislate, and I believe that certain committees, either the Appropriations Committee or Ways and Means, should remain here during the recess and consider whether it is advisable in this emergency to provide for a bond issue of $2,000,000,000.

I favor balancing the Budget for the running expenses of the Federal Government. I favor increasing taxes. We are in an economic emergency, and I think the best thing we could do would be to face the facts and help restore confidence among our people, and I believe the best way to do that would be to float a bond issue of $2,000,000,000 and have that money in the Treasury, so that when Congress decides where it is most needed we will have it on hand instead of waiting until next June to get it, because the emergency exists now, and will be at its worst for the next three or four months. If Congress waits until we come back and then decides to consider voting a bond issue and passing some legislation requiring a bond issue, then it will take months to float the bonds and make the necessary funds available.

I will say to the gentleman that I am very much opposed to a financial dole, for I believe the financial dole has been the economic ruin of Germany and of Great Britain. But I do favor in this country of ours—still the richest nation in the world—that we take care of those who are undernourished or who may be starving during the coming winter months. With an overabundance of grain, we can not afford to permit any American citizen to starve or freeze to death.

The reason I rose to-day was to advocate a bill I introduced a year ago and reintroduced a week ago, providing that the grain which is owned by the Grain Stabilization Corporation under the Farm Board should be turned over to the American Red Cross, to be processed into flour and then distributed through the Red Cross and other charitable organizations to the unemployed, and to those in need, in distress and starving in the United States.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. SWING. Before leaving the topic of a bond issue for an enlarged internal building program to help the unemployed, does not the gentleman agree that if it is proper, as national leaders say, for cities, counties, and States to adopt enlarged local building programs for the unemployed, that the Federal Government ought to follow its own advice?

Mr. FISH. I will go further than that. The gentleman and myself have served in this House for a good many years and we have often heard it repeated that in periods of stress and depression it was the logical time to build. Now, for the first time since the gentleman and I have been here, outside of 1921, we are in the midst of a serious depression and we are told we must not talk about building. The Bureau of the Budget is even holding up the $80,000,000 new post office bill, because it is afraid a bond issue may be necessary, and that is not wanted. I am not asking that this $2,000,000,000 loan that I propose—it may be $3,000,000,000 or $4,000,000,000—should be used entirely for construction work, whether it be public buildings, roads, or waterways. I would have it used for many other things, not merely for a building program. I agree with the gentleman that it is sound common sense that in time of depression we should authorize bond issues and should have them now for a building program. The wage earners of this country are not asking for charity. They are asking for work, and I think the only way we can provide work is through a bond issue for a large, constructive building program, not for political purposes, not for something that will have no value after a few years, but for constructive purposes for the good of our entire people.

Mr. SWING. I want the gentleman to know that I fully approve of what he is saying and I hope a way will be found to carry his suggestions into execution.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. For a brief question.

Mr. HOPE. I want to ask the gentleman about the bill he mentions to give some of the Farm Board wheat to relief agencies. Does the gentleman think that that wheat will displace any wheat which may be sold——

Mr. FISH. I will take that up when I discuss the proposal to turn over the Government wheat to the American Red Cross.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. For a very brief question; yes.

Mr. GLOVER. Does the gentleman favor the principle that is announced in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to have this post-office building program start with the lower brackets of $5,000 receipts and carry them up to the present standard?

Mr. FISH. I can not answer the gentleman. I have not made sufficient study of the question to give the gentleman an intelligent answer. I can say this, however: The Treasury Department has informed me that by next June they will have to dismiss a large number of employees, who will have nothing to do unless the new building program goes through. I can not yield further.

I would like to take this opportunity to read into the RECORD some information that came to me since the discussion of the moratorium that occurred here during the past 10 days. I was in favor of the moratorium, because I believed it was essential to the economic stability of Germany and other nations of Europe, possibly of our own, and for the peace of the world. I think it would not do any harm to have this little clipping which I hold in my hand put in the RECORD. It is headed, "Shouse hits McFADDEN. In Omaha he criticizes attack over the moratorium."

This in an A. P. article from the New York Times dated December 17:

Jouett Shouse, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, asserted to-day: "I have no sympathy with the charges Representative McFADDEN has made against President Hoover." He added: "President Hoover's request for a 1-year moratorium in intergovernmental debts was the only thing he could have done."

I also want to put in the RECORD a brief statement that reached me to-day, particularly as the matter is still being discussed in the other legislative branch of the Government. Possibly some of the people here may recall this matter. I must say I had certainly forgotten all about it. It may have been discussed on the floor when I was not here; but, in any event, I have no knowledge of it. It is taken from the Affairs Magazine of December 18, 1931.

It was learned that the State Department in 1927 sent a letter to American bankers interested in German loans, warning them against loaning the Reich more money.

The letter was sent just after the report of S. Parker Gilbert, which showed that Germany was tremendously overborrowed and that continued loans would bring about a world-wide catastrophe.

The State Department admitted the sending of the letter, but refused to make the text public, on the ground that it would jeopardize the American position that private debts come before reparations.

This is one of the chief points of difference between France and the United States at the Basel discussion, France having invested almost no money in Germany during the period that American bankers were loaning $1,300,000,000.

I believe this to be an accurate statement, because everything I have seen in this magazine for years past has been strictly accurate, to my knowledge, with respect to foreign affairs. If this letter was written to the bankers by the State Department in 1927, then it should be made public now, and it would be absolute proof that the bankers went ahead regardless of this warning of the State Department, or from Parker Gilbert, and sold German bonds to American investors in order to profit on the commissions, regardless of what the security was to the American investing public, who have been mulcted and may be ruined.

Mr. Chairman, about a year ago, on January 8, 1931, I introduced in this House a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 456) authorizing the disposition of wheat purchased by the Federal Farm Board for the relief of distress in the United States. A hearing was held on this resolution before the Committee on Agriculture. At that time the committee thought there was not sufficient hunger or distress in America to report out the bill.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. FISH. The condition, as we all know, is far more serious now. We have 5,000,000 unemployed in the United States, and probably we will have several million more unemployed before the winter is over. Fear and dread exist throughout the land, not only among the unemployed and their families, but also among those who are fearful of losing their jobs.

We, the Congress, have failed so far—almost—to recognize the critical situation of the unemployed and their distress and need.

Yesterday the Committee on Agriculture, of the other legislative body, reported out almost an identical resolution to mine, and it is stated in the public press that an effort will be made to pass that measure to-day and send it over to the House in order to give a Christmas present by the Government to the unemployed.

I ask you, in all fairness, why should we not turn over a part of this grain, owned by the Government of the United States, now in bulging granaries throughout the land? We have an overabundance of food supplies and grain, and it seems to me to be sound and logical for the Congress to pass a resolution giving this grain to the Red Cross; and I am informed that the Red Cross will take the grain and process it into flour, and distribute it among the unemployed; and wherever there is hunger or need anywhere in the land.

The Farm Board is in favor of the proposition. I am informed that 1,000,000 bushels of wheat make 225,000 barrels of flour. One person averages one barrel of flour in 12 months; but, in addition to the six or seven million expected unemployed during the winter, they have their families to maintain, and there are, perhaps, three or four in a family. So you can multiply 6,000,000 by three, and you will get about 20,000,000 people that may have need of receiving these foodstuffs during the winter months.

I know that private charity will never provide sufficient food to feed 20,000,000 people this winter.

So if we are going to act we ought to act at the present time, and if this resolution comes over from the Senate to-day or to-morrow I hope Members on both sides of this aisle will support that legislation unanimously as a Christmas gift to the unemployed.

I am not suggesting whether any appropriation should go with the bill or whether it should be credited against the Stabilization Corporation. I do say that we can not afford to sit silent any longer on the question of unemployment and providing foodstuffs for the unemployed.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. I understood the gentleman to say that he advocated the processing of the wheat.

Mr. FISH. Not by the Government. Officials of the Red Cross assure me that if the grain is turned over to them they will arrange to have it processed into flour and distributed through the country, not only by the Red Cross but by other charitable agencies.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How far is that from a dole?

Mr. FISH. In my opinion there is a distinct difference between a financial dole and a dole of food to your own people. I want the House to remember and every Member of the House to remember that back in 1921 you voted through this House $20,000,000 to provide foodstuffs for the starving women and children of Soviet Russia on the Volga River, some 5,000 miles away.

In 1924 I introduced in the House a bill appropriating $10,000,000 to provide foodstuffs for the starving women and children in Germany, and it went through the House of Representatives by a vote of 240 to 97. That also was to provide foodstuffs for people in a foreign country. If private charity is not sufficient to carry the burden and provide for the hungry and clothe and house the destitute, then it is clearly the duty of the Federal, State, and municipal governments to contribute their full share and assume their proper responsibilities.

I have no patience whatever with any individual who tries to hide behind the Constitution when it comes to providing foodstuffs for our own citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. AMLIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. AMLIE. From an economical standpoint, would not that be the same as if the board were to dump the wheat on the market for nothing?

Mr. FISH. I stated before that that was a matter for the House and the committees to work out. I will say this, that we are the richest country in the world, and we can not afford to hide behind the Constitution of the United States and say that we have no responsibility for the welfare and well-being and happiness and lives of the American people. I have no patience with that form of political philosophy, because beyond and above the Constitution every reason exists why the Government should provide for the health and happiness of all of our own people. [Applause.] We must destroy the fear of insecurity by serving notice definitely, no matter what the cost may be, that an ample supply of foodstuffs will be furnished all unemployed American wage earners during this emergency.

Now, do not for a moment, if that bill comes over here, let any constitutional lawyers in this House—and I am speaking to-day because I do not expect to be here to-morrow—do not let any constitutional lawyers preach about the glories and sacredness of the Constitution when the lives of our women and children are affected—when people may starve in the meantime. Failure of the Federal Government in this crisis not to exert its utmost efforts to help relieve the suffering and misery of the American people would be a fatal indictment against the Federal Government.

We are not giving away anything at all. This is not a financial dole. It seeks to protect the lives and security of American citizens in this emergency, and I hope it will have unanimous support from both sides of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY].

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I introduced a bill (H. R. 6022) providing for a nation-wide system of durable, hard-surfaced post roads. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a synopsis of the main features of the bill that I have prepared.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE HOLADAY POST ROADS BILL (H. R. 6022)

A bill in relation to the construction, maintenance, and regulation within and by the United States of America of a nation-wide system of durable hard-surfaced post roads and their appurtenances and the provision of means for the payment of the cost thereof

PURPOSE OF THE BILL

1. To construct for free public use a nation-wide system of straight and wide and safe, strong, and connected transcontinental and trunk-line hard-surfaced post roads:
a. Priorities may be given for official business.
b. War Department may control in time of public danger.
2. To maintain such post roads in first-class condition.
3. To regulate such post roads by uniform rules.
4. To build airplane fields alongside these post roads:
a. For transfer of airplane and post-road mail.
b. For interchange of airplane and post-road commerce.
c. Airplanes are likely to follow these post-road trails.
5. To provide moneys to defray the expenditures authorized.

PLAN OF THE BILL

1. To connect the National Capital and State capitals and principal cities and great waterways by straight and wide and unbroken hard-surfaced post roads of a high type:
a. Routes provided for are located somewhat generally.
b. Routes may be renumbered or named.
2. To make the work self-sustaining.

FINANCIAL PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

1. General direction of the finances to be under the Secretary of the Treasury, subject to the President's approval.
2. To borrow money needed on the credit of the United States.
3. To issue and sell bonds therefor to an amount not exceeding $5,000,000,000:
a. Sale of bonds will bring money back into circulation and make funds immediately available for building and completing at once all of these post roads.
b. Moneys needed are appropriated in the bill.
c. Moneys can be used only for the purposes designated.
4. To provide means to pay the bonds, both principal and interest:
a. The faith and credit of the United States is pledged, in the first instance, to such payment.
b. Private users of the post roads to contribute the major part of the cost:
x. By paying a small annual tax, not less than $3, on each motor vehicle not used for hire.
y. By paying a small annual tax, not less than $10, on each motor vehicle used for hire.
z. By paying a small tax, not less than one-half cent per gallon, on gasoline or other motor vehicle fuel.
(The use of such high-type post roads would greatly reduce the cost of motor-vehicle upkeep and depreciation and thereby save to each user each year many times the amount of the aforesaid taxes.)
c. Official users of the post roads may contribute a minor part of the cost out of general revenues:
x. War Department for use by motorized army.
y. Post Office Department for carrying mail.

ENGINEERING PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

1. The post roads to be completed within five years:
a. Aggregate mileage of 57,000 miles divided among 48 States makes:
x. Average total mileage for each State 1,200.
y. Average mileage for construction each year in a single State only 240.
b. Work to be carried on in all States simultaneously:
x. Under contracts let on competitive bidding.
y. By the Government direct if satisfactory bids are not received.
2. Control of work, all subject to President's approval:
a. General direction and control of kind, character, and cost of work to be under Secretary of Agriculture.
x. Superintending engineer with wide experience in road building to aid in construction work.
y. Assistant engineers with wide experience in road building to aid also.
z. Engineers to be paid salaries commensurate with great importance of proposed work.
3. Secretary of Agriculture is given power to obtain labor, materials, machinery, and lands:
a. By purchase from private sources.
b. Necessary lands and rights of way to be obtained by purchase or by exercise of the right of eminent domain.
4. Post roads to be as straight as may be practicable from an engineering standpoint so as to furnish safe, rapid, and economical transportation:
a. For trunk-line and transcontinental traffic.
b. For a motorized army.
5. Roadways to be of the best and most durable hard-surfaced type available.
6. Roadways to be wide enough and strong enough to meet all proper traffic requirements:
a. Hard-surfaced roadways to be not less than 20 feet wide.
b. Around cities of over 200,000, hard-surfaced roadways to be not less than 40 feet wide for not less than 25 miles out from city limits.
c. Around cities of over 800,000, hard-surfaced roadways to be not less than 60 feet wide for not less than 10 miles out from city limits.
d. These widths and distances to be increased whenever deemed necessary, with the President's approval.
e. Dirt shoulders and graveled turnouts to be provided.
7. Post roads to be made safe for traveling public:
a. Railway grade crossings shall be eliminated.
b. Grades may be separated at route intersections.
c. Routes and traffic lanes to be kept marked.
d. Inbound traffic lanes may be separated from outbound lanes.
e. Routes may be lighted if practicable and advisable.
8. Belt-line roads may be constructed around cities of over 200,000.

UNIFORM REGULATION AND CONTROL

1. This nation-wide system of post roads to be regulated and controlled by one central Federal agency instead of by 48 independent legislative bodies.
a. Unfair competition among common carriers will be eliminated.
b. Regulations will be the same in every State.

REFUNDS TO STATES

1. Where a route runs over or near a paved highway, paid for by a State or by one of its subdivisions, such a pavement may be taken over and utilized in the national system upon refunding its value to the State:
a. If the State highway runs on the straight lines required by the national system.
b. If the State highway is of the high character required by the national system.
c. If the State gives its consent.

This bill will supplement the Federal highway act because—

1. Federal aid does not provide for the immediate construction of such straight and wide and connected trunk-line and transcontinental hard-surfaced roads.
2. Federal aid provides nothing for maintenance and regulation.

3. Federal aid does not require permanent improvement of Federal-aid roads:

a. About 66 per cent of all so-called improved Federal-aid roads are of low type—that is, of only graded and drained, sand-clay or gravel construction.

x. Such roads soon call for further improvement by patching, widening, or strengthening.

b. Federal aid leaves a way open for patchwork or disconnected construction because—

x. A State may use its Federal aid on one of its primary Federal-aid roads one year and on another far-distant primary road the next year, and so on.

y. Adjoining States may select for improvement widely separated primary roads, leaving almost impassable gaps between them.

4. Federal aid does not meet the traffic needs in or near large cities or where large rivers must be bridged or mountains crossed—

a. The Federal-aid limit of $25,000 per mile leaves too heavy a burden on a State and its local units.

b. Compulsory maintenance by the State adds greatly to this burden.

5. Federal aid is not financed to insure the early completion of a nation-wide system of connected hard-surfaced roads of a high type, but it depends upon the uncertain and fluctuating appropriations of each succeeding Congress—

a. No means are provided to meet such appropriations.

b. Moneys no longer come in from excise taxes on the motor vehicles which use the roads.

CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY FOR THE BILL

1. Power is given to Congress to borrow money.

2. Power is given to establish and build post roads.

3. Power is given to lay and collect taxes and provide for the common defense and general welfare.

PROSPECTIVE EFFECTS OF THE BILL

1. The building and maintaining of these post roads by the Government would invite prosperity, aid farm relief, and promote the general welfare—

a. The road-building work itself would furnish a million men with profitable employment for five years or more.

b. Another additional million men would be needed in quarries, mills, plants, factories and shops, and on railroads to supply the enormous quantity of road-building materials required, as well as machinery and transportation.

c. Three or four million additional people would be required to provide coal, shoes, clothing, foodstuffs, and other necessaries for the first 2,000,000 workers.

d. The building and maintaining of these post roads would stimulate the improvement of the more than 1,200,000 miles of rural mail routes that would be left.

e. The cost of building and maintaining these great trunk-line roads would be taken off the States and leave each State and its local subdivisions with more revenue to improve farm-to-market roads to the great benefit of the farmer and the consumer of his products.

2. These post roads would bring the States into closer unity.

3. These post roads would open new lines of communication and tend to encourage more cordial relations and friendly intercourse with the countries lying beyond the American border.

SAFEGUARDS IN THE BILL

1. All work must meet with the approval of the President of the United States:

a. The bill requires the work to be done for the best interests of the entire American people.

b. The President is given plenary power to carry out the spirit and purpose of this requirement.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I had no thought 10 minutes ago of having anything to say on the things that have been discussed here to-day, but I asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] a question a moment ago when he was discussing a very vital matter as to whether or not he favored the proposition as outlined in a bill by our distinguished colleague on this side of the House, Mr. CRISP, of Georgia, with reference to carrying into effect the very thing that he was discussing, post-office buildings and other Government buildings. He did not have the time to yield, but, in my opinion, that bill strikes at the very thing we ought to have done in the beginning of the construction of our post-office buildings. As we have it now, under existing law, a city having a post office with receipts of less than $20,000 is not eligible for a post-office building. The result of this character of legislation has caused the bulk of the money that we have appropriated for post-office buildings to go into the larger centers, where many of them already have good post-office buildings. The Crisp bill provides for starting with the lower brackets of $5,000 of receipts before it becomes eligible for a building and carries it on up to the $20,000, and then provides for an appropriation of $300,000,000 to carry out that idea. If you will start on this plan, the gentleman's idea of carrying out the improvements and scattering them over the United States where they will do the most good, you will carry this to every county in the United States. The idea is to provide for these smaller buildings which do not cost much money, ranging from about $30,000 to $75,000 or $100,000 to the building. That will give employment and scatter it to every nook and corner of our country and give some aid to each State and county.

There is another suggestion in the gentleman's speech with reference to issuing bonds. I have not consulted my side of the House, and I am not one of the so-called leaders, and I am not proposing to speak for them, but I have my individual ideas about matters pertaining to legislation, and as long as I am here I propose to carry out in my votes my idea of what is right to my people. I am not in favor of the plan proposed by the administration leaders to increase the taxes in the manner they outline. I rather think that the gentleman's idea is right in part, and I so stated in a speech the other day, in respect to issuing some bonds, and then if you are going to raise taxes, let it be only in the higher brackets of income. When you get down to the root of the question of depression which is before us, and business dragging, it has been brought about largely by the question of taxation. The people of the country have borne this until they can stand it no longer.

Another matter was discussed which I desire to notice, and that is the resolution by the gentleman from Illinois to investigate and see if we can arrive at what brought about and caused this depression. I think he is striking at the very root of this thing. I would like to see a joint committee of the House and the Senate investigate the stock exchanges of the United States; and when you make that investigation, I think you will uncover some of the secrets of what has brought this about. When we had the moratorium here Friday, we were told that that is going to correct the evils. Where? It may help over there in Germany, but I say it is not going to help in America. You have voted to give a moratorium of $252,000,000 to Germany, and now you propose to collect it from the American people in taxes. I was very much surprised that most of you on the Republican side of the Hall stood almost in a body and voted for this proposition for the granting of a moratorium. I presume you were pledged to it by the long-distance message in the manner not provided for by the Constitution. My belief is that it is an exceedingly dangerous precedent. So long as I have the honor to represent my people, I am not coming to this body stultified by a pledge made to somebody 1,200 miles away from me when I have no chance of discussion of the subject with him. I was surprised when we came back here in respect to the farm loan bill. They came back with the identical principle to give the farmer a moratorium of one year and you voted almost solidly against it. Why not give the moratorium to John Jones and Bill Smith and the other boys back at home who own their little farms?

We asked you to give them a moratorium for one year, and you stood there and voted almost solidly against it. How are you going to meet your farmers when you go back to your homes, and how will you explain this to them? I am glad that you are in the RECORD on it. I am glad to be on the other side of the question over here with my matchless leader, HENRY RAINEY. I am in good company when I am standing with 95 Democrats and 5 Republicans that voted with us against this moratorium. Not only that, but here was another proposition you voted down after doing that. You voted against an amendment to the bill we had here on Saturday that would give a right of redemption to a farmer who had lost his land by foreclosure and whose land is now in the possession of the Government. You would not vote to give him a chance to redeem his own land by paying every cent against it. Oh, you are going to meet your friends back at home in the middle of the road, and you are going to faint when you meet them there. A man who would not allow the right of redemption of a man's land taken in that way, and then will vote for the moratorium, is not in accord with my views of what is right to the American people.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. Not just now.

There was another discussion this morning with reference to the farm bill. I voted for that bill. I had more hope for it then than I have now. If you will investigate the RECORD, on the second Monday morning I was here in Congress I made a speech on that question. I said then that the bill did not go far enough, and I have offered amendments to it which I hope to see passed to make it effective. It is one of the finest set-ups in legislation that I have ever seen put together. The machinery is all right. I have no criticism of those who have been trying to operate it. There has not been any board that has received greater criticism than the board which is undertaking to administer the agricultural marketing act for an honest set of people who need help. The trouble is this great gambling machine, gambling in futures, that is bleeding the farmer's blood white, wants to see the law fail. I want to see that bunch of men brought to time. I want to see that gambling in futures stopped.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAINEY. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas three additional minutes.

Mr. GLOVER. I introduced a bill at this session to make it a felony to gamble in futures, gamble in the lifeblood of the farmer. I would like to see everyone of these gamblers punished until that is stopped. It ought not to be permitted.

The gentleman talks about unemployment. I say to you, gentlemen, that unemployment is going to continue until you change the policy under which you are working. The march of the unemployed is increasing every day of the year. Yesterday I had a letter from a farmer living not more than 5 miles from where I live pleading for something, something in the way of a job or anything he could do to save his little home to him and his family. It is mortgaged to the Federal Government for a loan. They can not live under the conditions that are going on now. My farmers down home are the greatest workingmen that were ever born in the world. We were in distress last year on account of the drought. This year they have gone back and doubled their energy and produced one of the most bountiful crops they ever had in that country. Now, gentlemen, how is it to-day? They can not sell their cotton. They can not sell any of their products. They have plenty to eat, but nothing to pay debts and buy the necessaries of life that they can not raise.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. GLOVER. I will give the gentleman a little information that I think will help him if he will wait.

When we were considering the moratorium, it was said it would be a panacea for all ills and cure all troubles. At that time cotton was 11 cents a pound. Now it is down to 6 cents a pound.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. GLOVER. Not now.

Mr. Chairman, I have taken more time than I had expected, and I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, in the last two or three days the newspapers over the country have been carrying the headline: "Veterans' Bonus of $200,000,000 passed by the House."

I notice another headline stating that "World War veterans get $200,000,000 Christmas appropriation."

By reason of these misleading headlines I have received a large number of letters wanting to know when they can get the remainder of their bonus. The veterans seem to have the impression that the bill to pay the adjusted-service certificates in full has already passed; that Congress has decided to be Santa Claus to the veterans and has passed a bill appropriating $200,000,000, which they understand will be sufficient to pay off the remainder of the certificates. That is a wrong impression. I am sure the newspapers did not intend to leave that impression; but they have done so, nevertheless, and it must be corrected or it will cause trouble for all the Members.

In connection with that I want to invite your attention to another misleading statement that has gone out recently. The distinguished gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], who was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House at the last session of Congress gave this statement to the press, which, if he has been quoted correctly, has contributed to the misleading information that has gone over the Nation relative to the adjusted-service certificates. I will just read what appeared in the Washington Herald:

> The suggestion of the probable administration's attitude came from Representative HAWLEY, of Oregon, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in the last Congress after he had paid a visit to the Treasury Department. HAWLEY said—

It quotes what purports to be the statement made by Mr. HAWLEY—

> "It is estimated the deficit will be about $2,000,000,000 in the fiscal year ending June 30. About $1,500,000,000 can be charged to the bill passed last year under which loans up to 50 per cent of adjusted-compensation certificates were made."

Of course, that is a statement to the effect that the veterans had caused the deficit in the Treasury. I am sure Mr. HAWLEY, if he investigated the source of his information, was convinced otherwise, and I hope he will correct the statement, because the statement is still going over the country through the newspapers. The truth about it is that not one penny of the Treasury deficit can be charged to loans made to veterans on their adjusted-service certificates, and if there is anyone in this House who differs with me on that I wish he would get up and say so. I want to convince him that he is wrong, because he is wrong. It is all right to charge the veterans with causing a deficit if they actually caused it, but not one penny of that deficit has been caused by loans made to veterans on the adjusted-service certificates.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman give a little further information?

Mr. PATMAN. I expect to.

Mr. UNDERHILL. What was the $200,000,000 that we just voted? Was that not a sum that will go into the deficit?

Mr. PATMAN. It is anticipating other loans on adjusted-service certificates that the adjusted-service-certificate fund will not be able to take care of.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And had to be provided for?

Mr. PATMAN. It will in the future. Not now.

For the information of the gentlemen there are two funds—the adjusted-service-certificate fund, which is made up by appropriations over a period of years of $112,000,000 a year, and interest on that fund, which amounts at this time to about $990,000,000. Then there is another fund, the United States Government life-insurance fund, which is just as separate from the Government as the Prudential life-insurance fund, or the life-insurance fund of any private insurance company. It represents the savings of veterans, who have paid the money to the Government themselves and who are paying every month in order to make up that fund. From these two funds every one of those loans has been made. From the adjusted-service-certificate fund $840,243,494.98 has been loaned, and from the United States Government life-insurance fund, $332,987,487.28 has been loaned, and there is remaining at this time—or I should not say at this time—but there was remaining at the time these figures were compiled, only a few days ago, $153,925,720 in the adjusted-service-certificate fund, which can be used to make more loans to veterans. The reason the President wanted this $200,000,000 appropriation made was not to give the veterans anything, but to have it available so that they could borrow their own money by paying 4½ per cent interest for that money, compounded annually.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SEGER].

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I am prompted to take up these few minutes of your time because of the presence here in committee of our genial Speaker of the House. I want to read to you an editorial from the Passaic (N. J.) Daily News, which speaks of his practicing economy and good judgment. It is captioned "GARNER'S Car," and reads as follows:

The Speaker's car follows the President's yacht into oblivion.

The long-standing joke between the late Speaker LONGWORTH and present Speaker GARNER is played out. GARNER says he won't use the car. Distances are short in Washington. He can just as well walk or take a street car, or a cab, if he wants to be stylish. He will save the Government a little money. He has preached against extravagance and wants to practice it. It doesn't take an automobile to make an office dignified.

Now, gentlemen, I have been here for some years and I do not think we ever had a Speaker who was not dignified. I know JACK GARNER would look just as dignified riding in a street car as in a Government automobile. But, my friends, he is doing something of greater importance, to my mind, than the fact that he is practicing economy.

I took occasion the other day to ask some one who is familiar with the subject how many Members of Congress own automobiles. I was informed that 90 per cent of the Members own and ride in automobiles to and from the daily sessions of Congress. That is something to think about. Some of them own more than one car. I understand that one Member who is situated financially better than most of us owns seven. I know he does not ride in all seven at one time, and perhaps it is to his credit that he can afford to own so many.

However, there are things which, I think, we should be more concerned about than just riding in automobiles. We have lost in the last 11 months 14 of our friends and colleagues in this House and in the Senate. If not altogether true, I think it is partly true that the reason for these deaths is the lack of exercise, the lack of proper air, and the lack of proper food. It seems to me the lack of these vital things has gone a long way in causing this high mortality.

What do we do here? We come to our offices at 9 or 9.30 in the morning and we attend to our correspondence and meet our constituents between committee meetings. At 12 o'clock we come to the session of the House; we go downstairs to the lunch room and eat a fairly hearty meal; and then for five hours we sit here breathing synthetic air. We all know that both Chambers, the House and Senate, are surrounded by corridors with no outside ventilation to speak of.

Of course, the ventilation here is better than it used to be, but it is not pure, outside air. Then, after sitting here for five hours, we go to our homes in an automobile, eat a heavy dinner, and those who are socially inclined often go out and eat a midnight supper.

I just refer to this because I think it is something to think about. I do not think that necessarily a man becomes dignified because he rides in an automobile, but if he does not ride in an automobile and walks more, eats less, and breathes more of God's free air, he will be much better off for it.

The Speaker sets a good health example which we can all afford to follow. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the entire afternoon has been spent in considering subjects which are related to our present industrial and economic situation. The recurring theme has been, what can we do to meet the present need. I believe President Hoover, in his message to Congress, expressed a volume in one sentence when he said, "Our first step toward recovery is to reestablish confidence."

In general terms this expresses what every good American desires, although we find differing methods advocated. From a number of sources, outside of Congress, and inside too, we have heard suggestions that we might help to meet the situation by a general wage-cutting campaign on the part of the Government. In my estimation no greater blow against the reestablishment of confidence could possibly be struck than through such a policy.

In the last Congress we enacted a worthy measure called the "prevailing rates of wages" bill, by which we provided that when contracts are let by the Government for construction of public works, the wages to be paid by the successful contractor shall be the prevailing standard wages in the community where the work is done. The passage of this bill, without a doubt, has prevented unjust and oppressive practices in many communities.

We ought to consider what it means to undertake a wage-cutting campaign among Government employees. The United States Government is directly responsible for these wage standards. For my part, I believe that the Government has a wider responsibility even than that. The Government should have a direct interest in helping to so organize industry and commerce that there shall be a chance for every American citizen, able and willing to work, to put his hands to the task of producing the wealth that determines the welfare of the Nation. While there is disagreement on that point, no one will disagree with the statement that the United States Government is directly responsible for the wage standards of its own workers.

First, consider the injustice of wage cutting as applied to Government workers. The pay of those who make up the rank and file of the governmental personnel has always been low, considered from any standpoint. No person who enters the service has ever been able to look forward to more than a moderate livelihood for himself and family. To decrease that compensation now would be the essence of injustice.

It is argued that the cost of living has declined within the past two years and that wages might be decreased correspondingly.

If the cost of living is justly the sole consideration in fixing wage schedules, then governmental employees have a balance in their favor which it will take many years to pay.

What I shall say applies to all rank-and-file Government employees, but I shall refer specifically to the postal workers, with whose wage schedules I have been familiar for many years. Their present compensation schedules were carried in the law sponsored by myself—the postal pay act of February 28, 1925. For the 12 years prior to the passage of that act, postal employees were tragically underpaid. Their pay was reduced steadily by the mounting cost of living. In 1919 and 1920 their pay bought only half what it would have purchased in 1913.

Not for a single month during that long period were their wages equal in purchasing power to the pay of 1913 which was $1,200 per annum.

The act of 1925 provided a $300 increase to the basic pay, although there was universal public approval for an increase double that amount. The basic pay established by that act was $2,100, the maximum of the clerk-carrier automatic grades.

Even the increase did no more than restore compensation to the 1913 level. It did not mean a dollar more in purchasing power.

In 1930 the cost of living index was 160.7, which meant that there was slight actual gain in purchasing power over 1913.

In 1931 the cost of living index was 150.3, so that the basic salary of $2,100 is now equal to about $1,400 in 1913.

To show what happened to postal pay during these years, I have prepared a table showing the cost of living for each year and the salary necessary to equal $1,000 in 1913. It is as follows:

Year	Index number of cost of living	Salary necessary to equal $1,000 in 1913
1913 (December)	100.0	$1,000
1914	103.0	1,030
1915	105.1	1,051
1916	118.3	1,183
1917	142.4	1,424
1918	174.4	1,744
1919	199.4	1,994
1920	200.4	2,004
1921	174.3	1,743
1922	169.5	1,695
1923	173.2	1,732
1924	172.5	1,725
1925	177.9	1,779
1926	175.6	1,756
1927	172.0	1,720
1928	171.3	1,713
1929	171.4	1,714
1930	160.7	1,607
1931 (June)	150.3	1,503

The facts show that postal workers have in 18 long years, and for a temporary period only, succeeded in securing added purchasing power of about $17 a month. Is it just to attempt to take this small gain away from a great group of faithful public servants?

Remember, too, that we are all struggling to bring about economic recovery through increased commodity prices. Can anyone argue for wage cuts which would mean privation even at abnormally low prices, to say nothing of the higher prices which will certainly come?

Every dollar of benefit gained by reduced cost of living has gone to the relief of unemployed. There is scarcely a postal worker who has not been obliged to take on new obligations on account of unemployment. If we make it impossible for him to extend a helping hand, public agencies must take over the task he has assumed.

For my part, I can not bring myself to bemoan the fact that postal workers are in a little better position than they were in 1913. I can even be glad that increased purchasing power over a few months has helped just a little to offset the weary years when their pay was buying less than it did in pre-war times. They are abundantly entitled to a little surplus in the budget, and in all fairness we should wait until former deficiencies are met before we start reduction.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. What about reducing some of the subsidies paid to shipping companies and to the airplane concerns that are now operating?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that neither one of those two items enter into the postal deficit, but is entirely separated and segregated and should stand on its own merits as governmental-policy expenditures.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have said to the workers, "Produce more if you are to get more." On that basis the postal workers have not had the pay they have earned by increased productivity.

The total postal revenues in 1913 were $266,619,000, and it required 301,704 employees to produce that amount. Fifteen years later, in 1928, the revenues were $693,630,000, and they were produced by 367,518 employees of all classes. In other words, the addition of 65,814 employees accounted for increased revenues of $427,014,000. Even with the reduced revenues of 1931, occasioned entirely by the business depression, the postal personnel produced twice as much revenue as the same number would have produced at the 1913 rate. To reduce their pay now would in fact put a penalty upon efficiency and productivity.

The fact that there is a deficit now is no reason for any wage-cutting campaign. The dollars saved would not pay for the injuries done. Let this Government announce that it proposes to economize at the expense of its own employees and it will give its support to every kind of wage-cutting policy in private industry.

This depression of which we have heard so much this afternoon is characterized by production which can not be consumed for lack of purchasing power. The one thing needed to start the wheels of industry is added purchasing power in the hands of the people, and the one effective way of distributing purchasing power is through wages. The root of this industrial crisis is the fact that wages have not increased in proportion to productivity. Can anyone advocate action which will still further curtail purchasing power, the certain result of wage reductions?

Mr. Chairman, I have every confidence that this Congress has the intelligence and the courage to point the way to American business in this vital matter of maintaining wage standards. We should show in unmistakable fashion that the United States Government proposes to maintain its own wage standards unimpaired. We should make sure that the compensation which Government workers earn should be faithfully paid. We should announce that not one dollar of their purchasing power is to be reduced. Such action will be a step toward recovery through reestablished confidence. It will help to make possible that noble aspiration with which President Hoover closed his message to this Congress: "Ours must be a country of such stability and security as can not fail to carry forward and enlarge among the people that abundant life of material and spiritual opportunity which it has represented among all nations since its beginning." [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, it seems to be the order of the day to be discussing our woes and our troubles. Frankly, I have my serious doubts if there is anything sound which Congress can do that will raise America from her present ills.

I rather suspect that the more the Government interferes the worse they will be. I rather suspect that one of the things that has caused the present distress, as far as the Government is concerned, is the Federal Government straying far away from its field provided by the Constitution. I rather suspect that the welfare of the people as individuals, in so far as Government can touch it, properly rests back in the State governments.

I want to bring to your attention one illustration. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN] spoke on the floor of the House a few days ago, deploring the fact that the Federal land banks foreclosed mortgages in his State. He introduced an amendment to the Federal land bank bill that would have forced a year's extension of time to anyone writing in and asking for it. In other words, it was an equity-of-redemption statute.

If that amendment had been adopted, it would have grossly discriminated between our citizens. The gentleman from Arkansas spoke of it a little while ago. Go down into his district and take the cases of Mr. Smith and Mr. Jones. Mr. Jones has a mortgage given to the Federal land bank; Congress has granted him an equity of redemption. Mr. Smith has a mortgage given to the New York Central Life Insurance Co. or to some joint-stock land bank, the McKeown amendment would have given Mr. Smith no such extension.

If you want an equity-of-redemption statute, the place to get it is the State government, and not from Congress.

I do not wish to deride the State of Oklahoma, for I am fond of it, but as far as an equity of redemption is concerned, she has none, while in my State we have 18 months. I think the equity of redemption is a matter that should go back to the States. The amendment of Mr. McKEOWN would be taking care of a mortgagor who is fortunate enough to have given his mortgage to a Federal land bank, but it did not take care of the man who was not so fortunate.

Another thing, probably the worst thing the McKeown amendment would do, would be to destroy the Federal land banks themselves, unless Congress was willing to appropriate enough money to carry them on without collecting their mortgage debts.

That takes us back to the proposition that the gentlemen from New York [Mr. FISH and Mr. LAGUARDIA] talked about.

When we talk about the welfare of the individual and the present depression, I do not believe there is an obligation on the part of the Government of the United States to take care of the welfare of the individual as an individual. That is an obligation of the States and the counties. When I was a member of the Kansas Legislature they referred to me as a States Rights Republican. I am not going to be scared away from the great doctrine of State rights and State sovereignty because I happen to be of northern ancestry. It was sound, and it is sound (however, never to the extent of rebellion), and to-day I would say, shades of Calhoun, shades of Haynes, shades of Lee and your great Army of the Confederacy, what have you to say when a Congressman from Alabama comes to the United States Congress and says the Government of the United States must feed the people of Alabama? Where is your State sovereignty? State sovereignty carries with it State responsibility, and if we destroy State sovereignty, the burden is going to be great on the Federal Government. I can not concede to the proposition that there is any obligation on the Government of the United States to furnish in public work employment for those who are unemployed. First, it is the obligation of government to be just and equal to every citizen. Is there a man to-day who will insist we ought to have enough public work to furnish employment for six and a half million men? Of course not. Very well. We will furnish work for 100,000 men. Who are to be the specially privileged ones to be lifted out of the slough of unemployment?

If the Federal Government takes responsibility upon the theory of depression alone to furnish employment for one single citizen now out of employment, then the Government of the United States by every obligation of decency should furnish employment to the entire six and one-half million; and when that time comes, then the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] will know something about communism in America. All I know about communism is that it is a society wherein everybody works for the government and, therefore, the government must have all of the income; and whenever the Government of the United States takes upon itself the responsibility of furnishing employment for six and a half million people, then we are at communism and no other place. In my humble opinion, the most the Government can do at this time in a practical, effective way is to reduce the cost of Government. Every dollar that is going to be paid in taxes by this industry or that industry is one dollar which is not going to be paid for labor. Every dollar we increase taxes in this session of Congress, in my judgment, will promote unemployment rather than demote it.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. How is the gentleman going to reduce the expense of Government?

Mr. McGUGIN. I am going to get to that. When I start to reduce the expense of Government, I would do exactly the opposite from what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] said. I would have the courage to meet this thing fairly and justly and cut public salaries. The gross wages of this country have been reduced 50 per cent; the income of the farmer has been reduced 43 per cent; agriculture, oil, coal, lead, and every industry we can think of has been reduced; and if we let public expense go on and public salaries go on, it simply means that we are going back to the people who now have decreased incomes and say to them you must bear the burden.

I come now to the Postal Department. It is said that it is a dangerous thing and heresy to talk about cutting salaries. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] just said that the salary of these employees from 1913 increased from $1,300 to $2,100 a year. That is an increase of 85 per cent. Let us go back to the rural carrier. The rural carrier who carries the mail to the farmers of this country is to-day receiving in salary and milage allowances nearly 100 per cent more than he received in 1913. Yet every farmer to whom he carries a newspaper or a letter is to-day living on 43 per cent less than he did before 1913. The Post Office Department is going behind some $93,000,000 a year. A 10 per cent cut in salaries will save $73,000,000 of that $93,000,000, and a 15 per cent cut will save $110,000,000. Before this session of Congress is over the last one of us is going to have an opportunity to do one of three things: Cut these public salaries; or say to the people who are now working on less than half time and whose incomes have been reduced, your postage bill must be raised 50 per cent; or else we are going to appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury to meet the deficiency, which passes the burden on back to industry. Which is right; to have the rural carrier take a 15 per cent cut or increase the postage bill 50 per cent of the farmer, whom he serves, when that farmer is now receiving 43 per cent less than he did in 1914?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. This deficit to which the gentleman referred is only about 17 cents out of the dollar. In other words, the revenues themselves for 1931 will produce the expenditures of the Post Office Department except about 17 cents. I insist that those 17 cents are the best expenditure that we can make for the public good and for the enlightenment of the people.

Mr. McGUGIN. Out of the Public Treasury?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. All right. Half of our trouble to-day is that one half this country is trying to live on a postwar inflated basis while the other half is on a pre-war deflated basis. When we talk about meeting this depression we are going to meet it when the people of this country, the last one of us, in a true spirit of patriotism and fairness to one another, are ready and willing to accept this depression as a national calamity and meet our share of the responsibility. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. I would like to ask a question. Would not a reduction in wages back to the period before the war take us back just that far in our history?

Mr. McGUGIN. It might. I am not asking that much of a reduction. In answer to the gentleman's question, it probably would; but, what are you going to do with the 27,000,000 farm people who are now 43 per cent below the 1914 level? What about the oil industry in this country, which is at the lowest depth of its history? What about the copper industry, and what about the coal industry? The great body of the people of this country are now below the pre-war level.

Mr. KELLER. I would put them all up.

Mr. McGUGIN. How will the gentleman do that?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I am in absolute accord and sympathy with the gentleman's statement, and I think he has told us just what we ought to hear, but when he speaks of an increase in the salaries of the rural mail carriers, does the gentleman know that practically every one of the farmers on his route signed a petition to Congress to increase that salary?

Mr. McGUGIN. I suppose that is true, but they are not talking that way now. The farmers were liberal in the days of their prosperity. Then they had no objection to liberal salaries. I say that these public salaries which were increased during the postwar inflated period were properly increased; they should have been increased; they were increased in keeping with the expense of the cost of living, and in keeping with the ability of the people to pay. Now that the cost of living has decreased and the income of the people has decreased, those public salaries should likewise be decreased, simply in keeping with the present limited ability of the people to pay taxes, and in keeping with the decreased cost of living.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. I noticed in the RECORD the interesting statement of the gentleman made on Saturday. I presume from that statement the gentleman believes there is an Oil Trust in this country.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am quite certain of that.

Mr. PATMAN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the trade practice conference agreement that was promoted by the Federal Trade Commission has made a contribution to that Oil Trust?

Mr. McGUGIN. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. PATMAN. The code of ethics of the large oil companies. Is the gentleman acquainted with that?

Mr. McGUGIN. I did not know they had any ethics.

Mr. PATMAN. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman that it is not ethical, but they have what they call a code of ethics.

Mr. McGUGIN. I will answer the gentleman's question like this, if the four monopolistic oil companies which I have particularly in mind, the Standard Oil of New Jersey, the Standard Oil of Indiana, the Gulf, and the Shell companies even make any pretense of having a code of ethics, then their claim is one of hypocrisy.

Mr. PATMAN. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman on that. Permit me to suggest, however, that the Oil Trust was organized by the Federal Trade Commission, and a member of that commission who has been responsible for organizing this trust has recently been reappointed, and his confirmation is pending before the Senate. If the gentleman is interested in breaking up this trust, I hope he will appear before the Senate Committee and oppose the confirmation of that man.

Mr. McGUGIN. I can not talk about trusts now. I want to talk about public expenses. I am thoroughly convinced that any of us would like to do whatever he can to alleviate distress, but you can not alleviate distress in this country by increasing the burden of those who are now in distress in order to keep those who are not in distress on a postwar inflated basis.

I thank you, ladies and gentlemen.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LOZIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the President's message, had directed him to report that the committee had come to no resolution thereon.

ELECTION OF COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to the immediate consideration of a resolution which I have sent to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

RESOLUTION OFFERED BY MR. RAINEY

House Resolution 79

Resolved, That the following Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the standing Committee on Indian Affairs, to wit: ANDREW L. SOMERS, of New York, and ROBERT S. HALL, of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

REFERENDUM ON WAR

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of world peace, and to include therein a brief summary by Rear Admiral Samuel McGowan of his plan of referendum prior to any declaration of war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, for the last 13 years the people of the whole world have given more thought to the plans, ways, and means of averting war and preserving peace than in any 100 years of previous time. It is a hopeful sign. Countless books have been written recently dealing with the subject of preventing war. Hardly a magazine issues from the press but has some article discussing this question. Many conventions and conferences have been held in all parts of the world. World machinery, such as the League of Nations, has been set up, seeking to eliminate war.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all this is a most encouraging condition. I believe that out of all this discussion we will finally reach—it may be many years—a practical working plan which the people of the world will accept and abide by. It may take one or two generations more to reach this goal. But since war has been the greatest time-consuming and wealth-consuming business of man throughout recorded history, we need not expect a quick solution for so great a problem. But let the search go on.

It is in this spirit I am offering for wide publicity and preservation in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following outline of a plan sponsored by Rear Admiral Samuel McGowan, retired. Out of his rich and varied experiences as the Navy's Chief of Supplies during the World War period, Admiral McGowan offers some valuable information and a very intriguing suggestion.

ADMIRAL MCGOWAN'S PLAN

Peace is the heart's desire of every right-minded American.

Not the peace at any price hawked about by purblind pacifists but the lasting and honorable peace planned by the founders of this Republic to secure for posterity "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"—the peace (wholly consistent with and dependent upon adequate national defense) which 19 centuries ago was commended by One far wiser than Wilson or Roosevelt or Lincoln or Washington:

"When a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace!"

As it stands to reason that peacemaking, like charity, begins at home, America's best contribution toward the peace of the world would unquestionably consist in making it most difficult for this Nation to become involved in war, by providing in advance that the people themselves shall determine their country's course and by further providing (also in advance) that, should war come, the money power as well as the man power shall be mobilized and controlled.

So far-reaching a program quite naturally suggests obstacles, many and serious; but it will be seen upon careful consideration that only common sense is required to overcome these obstacles—common sense coupled with the will to win as exemplified by the Navy's World War slogan:

"IT CAN'T BE DONE; BUT HERE IT IS"

Amend the Constitution now so as to require that before war can be declared or participated in (except only in the event of attack or invasion) there shall be a referendum; that if a majority of the votes cast be for peace, there the matter ends; if for war, every able-bodied male citizen between the ages of 18 and 35 shall be drafted; that from the day war is declared until peace is finally concluded no price or wage shall exceed what it was 90 days prior to such declaration, and all profits in excess of 5 per cent shall be forfeited to the Government; that no person, firm, or corporation shall in peace time or in war time be accepted as a contractor who is not a manufacturer of, or regular dealer in, the articles offered to be supplied—a regular dealer being none other than one who at the time the offer is submitted either owns outright the articles offered or dependably controls their source of supply.

By thus amending its own Constitution and setting a practical example which every nation could—and many, if not all, might—follow, the United States would be taking its stand and doing its share toward preserving world peace.

The advance referendum would, of course, have the effect of curtailing to just that extent the authority now vested in Congress; but since such authority is nowhere near commensurate with the awful responsibility entailed it is beyond belief that representatives of the people could after mature deliberation fail to welcome a mandate direct from the people (whose servants they are) before arriving at a decision which might mean plunging the country into war and making cannon fodder out of the flower of American manhood.

I believe whole-heartedly in the draft, in limiting prices and wages, and in the forfeiture of excess profits; but this is not enough.

My own personal experience as the Navy's supply chief throughout the world War makes me know—not think, but know—that pyramided prices and inflated wages and the excessive profits directly incident thereto are not the only methods by which wartime profiteers would hope to loot the Public Treasury—conspicuous among other avenues of far-flung graft (to which any emergency so readily lends itself) being manipulation in the award of contracts and tampering with inspections so as to admit of short weights and inferior deliveries, for all of which the Government is expected to pay in full.

Worst of all, each and every one of such sinister possibilities, and, maybe, many more, are well known beforehand by the individuals and interests whose itching palms make them ever willing to subject their country to any amount of loss and any degree of danger provided only that they themselves may profit thereby!

As a matter of fact, wars, like accidents, never really "happen." They are caused. And, as long as human nature is so weak and the love of money so strong, prospective profiteers will keep on scheming to provoke war for the deliberate purpose of wrongfully enriching themselves; it being of record in Holy Writ that "Love of money is the root of all evil."

Does anybody believe that high-pressure "observers" are hired at fancy figures to merely "observe" at international disarmament conferences?

Can any sane American dismiss as mere coincidence the enormous increase in the number of millionaires between 1914 and 1920?

If and when the sovereign people want war, it is their right, and have it they will; referendum or no referendum.

But why let any self-seeking minority have any chance whatsoever to hoax and coax the Nation into a war wanted by nobody except these selfsame swindlers?

There appears to be a very general misapprehension as to how long it would take to hold a referendum and learn the electorate's wishes on the subject.

The United States has long since graduated out of the stage-coach and pony-express class; and, although our "lame-duck" method of electing in the fall and not installing until the following spring (or later) would scarcely so indicate, there is no good reason why (in these days of quick communications) war or peace could not be voted and the result made known within 24 hours.

By midnight of the 4th of November, practically every intelligent adult in America knows (or could easily find out) who has been elected President that day.

Then why should it take any longer to get an answer to the infinitely more important question of peace or war?

Amend the Constitution as proposed, and you remove the present premium on war and in its stead impose a very heavy penalty. You put everybody on notice in advance that, if the people (to whom this country belongs) see fit to go to war, every citizen is going to be made to do his full share of the work and suffer his just proportion of the sacrifice—whereas whatever the Government may actually need is going to be bought fairly and squarely from bona fide business men and not from irresponsible speculators.

The idea of submitting any "made-in-America" war for advance approval (or disapproval) by the voters is based on Abraham Lincoln's conviction that the rank and file of the American people are not easily fooled, and surely it would require considerably more calamity howling and bloody shirt waiving to mislead many million principals scattered over 48 different States than to stampede their few hundred agents assembled together in one place!

After all is said and done, any man's estimate of any given situation is but the projection across that situation of his own individual personality—the resultant of his likes and dislikes, his predelictions and his prejudices, his hopes and his fears, his ruling passion, his innermost aim in life.

Now, what does the word "war" signify and suggest to the average patriotic American?

To the soldier and the sailor, work and yet more work; to the taxpayer, added burdens to be borne; to the legitimate business man, demoralization and probable loss; to the mother, separation, sorrow, tears; to the youth of the land, privation, danger, death!

Since our War of the Revolution against the mother country was fought for the principle that "taxation without representation is tyranny," is not the average patriotic American entitled to be consulted before making a decision of such vitally momentous consequence?

No red-blooded American could say, "Let us not fight if and when we ought to," but he can say (and this one does say), "Let us not originate a war unless and until we have to," remembering meanwhile and always that battles cost more than battleships, taxes are cheaper than tribute, and a little navy is a dangerous thing, but "When a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the policy pursued by the opponents of independence to the Philippine Islands of giving parts of a statement or extracts from a statement still continues. I have read in numerous papers that Mr. Quezon, Filipino leader, president of the Philippine Senate, former Commissioner to the United States, has abandoned his position in favor of complete independence for the Philippines and would accept in lieu of independence an increased autonomy, which I presume meant the election of a Filipino governor by the Filipino people.

This statement is not correct, so I ask permission to insert in the RECORD the entire report of Mr. Quezon to the Philippine Legislature.

It will be noted that because of his continued ill health, it was accompanied by his resignation as president of the senate and leader of his party. His resignation was rejected.

The statement I insert is in full, just as it was given to the Philippine Legislature. No one who reads it and understands English or wants in any way to be fair could interpret it as any abandonment of the aspiration for independence. The leader does ask for independence with free trade for a period of 10 years, but the two go together.

There was no compromise offered and none suggested. All of the three plans suggested by Mr. Quezon embrace independence, and he very carefully states that if independence must be given on terms of disadvantage, hardship, or even strain upon the Filipino people, it would be accepted, no matter how difficult the impositions might be.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

Mr. QUEZON's report is as follows:

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to submit the following report of my trip to the United States.

The Philippine Legislature on October 29, 1929, passed a concurrent resolution providing for the sending of a mission to the United States to be presided over by the president of the senate and the speaker of the house of representatives. The Resident Commissioners were made members ex officio of this mission.

Illness made it impossible for me to undertake the trip with the mission which, headed by the speaker of the house of representatives, left immediately for the United States, where it performed excellent work. The report of this mission has been in due time submitted to the legislature.

A RETROSPECT

During the administration of President Wilson the Congress of the United States, in 1916, enacted the Jones Act, which pledges the United States to grant the Philippines independence as soon as a stable government is established therein.

President Wilson, in his last message to Congress, reported that a stable government had been established in the islands and recommended that they be granted independence forthwith.

The Congress did not act on this recommendation. Then the Harding administration came into power, and President Harding, having in mind the last message of his predecessor, appointed the Wood-Forbes mission to investigate and report on the conditions obtaining in this country. The Wood-Forbes mission submitted an adverse report and recommended against the granting of independence immediately or at any time within a generation. The administration of President Harding acted in accordance with that report.

As the Filipino people disagreed with the findings and recommendations of the Wood-Forbes mission, a legislative mission was sent to the United States to refute the findings of said mission and to urge the granting of immediate independence. Though the plea of that mission went unheeded, the legislature continued to send other missions for the same purpose. One of these missions found in the Congress a sentiment which seemed favorable to the granting of independence. Bills to this end were introduced in the Senate as well as in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, but none of them reached the floor of either body. Then President Coolidge came out publicly and stated as his opinion that the time was far off when independence could be granted to the Filipino people, thus indorsing the policy enunciated by President Harding. It must be borne in mind that neither Harding nor Coolidge repudiated, but, on the contrary, reiterated, the pledge of the United States to grant the Philippines independence. They differed from the stand taken by President Wilson in his last message to Congress only as to the time when independence is to be granted. However, the effect of President Coolidge's pronouncement on this subject seemed to have relegated the Philippine question to the background, and thus it looked as though the uncertainty of the future political status of the islands was to continue for an indefinite time to the great disappointment of our people.

NEW FACTORS THAT ENTER INTO THE SITUATION

Such was the situation when in the summer of 1927 the sugar interests of Cuba, in which American investments total a billion dollars, began to give indications of their desire to eliminate from the American market the competition of Philippine sugar. These interests having noticed the increase in the production of Philippine sugar, and fearing that within a short time this increase would be augmented, as some one had wrongly predicted, to several million tons, they decided to work for the imposition of the tariff upon our sugar. The beet-sugar producers in the United States, then the dairy farmers who think they suffer from the competition of Philippine oil, and finally the labor organizations of the Pacific coast who want to stop Filipino immigration, also began to agitate in an attempt to secure from Congress legislation that would close the doors of America to Filipino importation and immigration.

ATTEMPT TO DISCRIMINATE AGAINST THE PHILIPPINES

In the sessions of Congress of 1928 and 1929 there were attempts to impose tariff on Philippine sugar and oil. A Philippine mission, headed by Senator Osmeña and Speaker Roxas, fought the proposed discrimnation against the island, as did also Secretary Stimson and the War Department, and the attempts failed.

EFFECT IN THE PHILIPPINES OF THE PRESENTATION OF SUCH MEASURES

The efforts thus made unjustly to impose a tariff on Philippine products, while the islands remained under American sovereignty, created among our people a feeling of uneasiness which beggars description. To the uncertainty of the grant of independence there was added the deep concern over the treatment which, in its economic relations with the United States, our country would receive under the American flag. The immediate effect was to stop either foreign or domestic capital from investing in new enterprises. And the most conservative Filipino saw the necessity of an immediate and definite solution of the Philippine question.

THE SESSIONS OF CONGRESS OF 1929 AND 1930

In the discussion of the last tariff bill in the Senate of the United States during the sessions of 1928 and 1929 those American interested parties exerted every effort to levy duty on Philippine sugar and oil. They met the opposition of Senators who believed that before free trade between American and the Philippines is abolished independence should first be granted. At last advocates and opponents of the proposal to impose a tariff on our products agreed to consider the question of independence in the following session of Congress (1929–30).

What took place regarding this question in that session (1929–30) with respect to the Philippines is related in detail in the Roxas mission's report to the legislature. Suffice it to say here that several independence bills were introduced in the Senate and hearings thereon held in the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs. The Philippine mission appeared in these hearings and urged the grant of independence. The administration, through the testimony of the Secretary of State and a letter addressed by the Secretary of War to the chairman of the committee, not only objected to all measures to grant independence but took the stand that it was neither necessary nor expedient to pass any legislation that would change the present government of the Philippines.

After these hearings the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs favorably reported the bill known as the Hawes-Cutting bill.

This bill does not grant immediate independence to the Philippines. Senator HAWES himself, during the Senate hearings and in connection with the testimony of Secretary of State Stimson, said that no bill granting immediate independence would be considered by the Senate. The Hawes-Cutting bill provides for the immediate establishment of an autonomous government, and, in respect to the trade relations between the United States and the Philippines it states that "the second year after the termination of the existing Philippine Government there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands and upon all articles coming into the Philippine Islands from the United States 25 per cent of the duties which are required by the respective Governments to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries," at the end of the third year the tariff duties will be raised to 50 per cent, at the end of the fourth year to 75 per cent, and at the end of the fifth year to 100 per cent.

From my sick bed in Manila I followed closely the development of these events. On the one hand, I feared that the attitude of the administration opposing all legislation that would change the present government of the Philippines would be successful, and, on the other, I was apprehensive as to the effect of the Hawes-Cutting bill upon our economic structure if it were approved, as reported by the Senate committee. It was certain, also, that nothing would be done in the next session of 1930–31, because this was a short session, and Congress would not then have time to act on such a controversial subject.

In other words, as I saw it, the situation was this: There was another perspective—worse than either of the two—namely, that a bill raising a tariff wall against our products and prohibiting Filipino immigration might be approved without change in our present political status. For the time being, the first event that I feared happened. No legislation affecting the Philippines was taken up by Congress during the sessions of 1929–30.

MY TRIP TO THE UNITED STATES

Such was the situation at this point when I decided to go to the United States.

My object was to see if I could expedite the settlement of the Philippine problem by securing an agreement on a measure that would fulfill the pledges of America to the Filipino people along lines that would promote best their interests. I felt that if I was to attain my object I had to convince the administration and win it over to my views. I also believed it necessary to find a way of satisfying the demands of those interests that thought, however wrongly, that they were injured by the importation of Philippine sugar and oil and the immigration of Filipino labor. As to Congress, it seemed to me that it was ready to take up the Philippine question and would act on the subject without much difficulty if the ground could properly be prepared.

Accordingly, upon arrival in the United States, I got in touch with representatives of the labor organizations on the Pacific coast and of the interests that are opposed to the free entry of Philippine products, bankers, merchants, newspaper publishers, Senators and Representatives, and other high Government officials.

IMPORTANCE OF THE SUPPORT OF THE ADMINISTRATION

I did my best to secure the support of the administration in our favor. It should be borne in mind that, even if it be true that there is a majority in both Houses of Congress favorable to the grant of independence, the administration can, by two means, thwart the enactment of legislation to which it is opposed. The first method is to block the passage of the bill in either House of Congress through Senators and Representatives of its own political party who are friendly to the administration; the second is for the President to veto the bill after it is passed by the Congress. And right here I want to say that I am more interested in securing the enactment of legislation beneficial to our country that would definitely settle the Philippine question in line with our national aspirations, even though it did not grant immediate, complete, and absolute independence, than in all the speeches and prospects about immediate independence, which, however brilliant and sincere, that could ensue if, after all, nothing would come out from them. It is undeniable that the great majority of the Filipino people desire immediate, complete, and absolute independence. It is also true that for 30 years we have been demanding it from the people and Government of the United States. But to date we have not succeeded. It is high time that we acted more like practical men rather than like theorists. I admit that the situation of the Philippine cause in the United States has changed considerably, because for the first time since American occupation there are interested parties there actively working to create public opinion in favor of Philippine independence. It is also true that, partly as an outcome of this, there is the belief in Washington that there will be a majority in both Houses in the next session of Congress to carry any measure granting Philippine independence. But even in such a situation Senators and Representatives, advocates of independence, have told me that if the administration be opposed to any independence bill its enactment could not be assured.

CONFERENCES WITH THE ADMINISTRATION

Shortly after my arrival in Washington I paid an official call on the President and held conferences with Secretary of State Stimson and the Secretary of War.

Speaking with Secretary Stimson, I told him that the policy of economic development which he enunciated in the Philippines when he was governor general had received a deathblow with the attempts at a change in the economic relations between the United States and the Philippines; that, therefore, whatever might have been the opinion he had hitherto held on the Philippine question, in the interests both of the American and the Filipino peoples, the Philippine situation must be defined by the enactment of legislation to this effect. Secretary Stimson, without expressing to me any concrete opinion as to what should be done, gave the impression that whatever might be agreed upon between the Secretary of War and myself would not be objected to by him when submitted to the President.

In my conversations with the Secretary of War I expressed the gratitude of the Filipino people for the stand taken by his department in opposing the bills on Philippine importation and Filipino immigration, as well as the efforts to apply the coastwise law to the islands. Secretary Hurley expressed his appreciation and warned me as to what on these subjects might happen at the next session of Congress. I told him that it was precisely because I shared his forebodings that I was in Washington and that I wanted therefore to discuss a plan that would put an end to this situation. With respect to the free-trade and labor-immigration questions, I expressed the hope that some way could be found to harmonize the interests of the Filipinos and that of those against the free entry of our products and of Filipino laborers into the United States. I also gave it as my opinion that my people would not object to the limitation of the free entry of sugar and oil and the restriction of labor immigration so long as this was made a part of a larger program that would finally solve the Philippine problem in accordance with our national aspirations. I emphasized that the most pressing need of the islands was a definite understanding as to the political and economic relationship between the United States and the Philippines on a basis satisfactory to both peoples, and I assured him that even the Americans and foreigners here agree with the Filipinos, that the insecurity of the present relations should terminate. I described the sentiments and stand of the Filipinos thus: That the masses of the Filipino people, jointly with a great majority of farmers, merchants, and professionals, are in favor of immediate, absolute, and complete independence of the Philippines, with free trade for some time, if this were possible, and without free trade if need be.

I also told him that a minority among the farmers, merchants, and professionals would be satisfied for the present with an autonomous government in the Philippines, with free trade with the United States, even if with limitations as to sugar and oil; and that probably some of them—a very few—would prefer such a solution to complete and immediate independence. But that even the latter would want a period of, say 10 or 15 years, to be fixed (and an insignificant minority among them would probably accept a longer time) at the expiration of which the Filipino people should be given complete independence or the option to have it if they so desire. I told him finally that both the conservative and the radical Filipinos would be united in favor of immediate independence even without free trade if the only other alternative was the continuation of the present uncertainty of the political and economic relations between America and the Philippines. I than expressed the hope that the Secretary might find it advisable to recommend to the administration that it take the initiative and urge Congress to pass some legislation that might be agreed upon as between the administration and the Philippine Legislature.

NO AGREEMENT

After a series of conferences with Secretary Hurley in which we discussed all the aspects of the Philippine question—economic, political, social, and international—I found that the Secretary would not commit himself, nor did he want to commit the administration in advance, to any program requiring legislation on the part of the Congress.

In my last call on Secretary Hurley in his office in the Department of War, my last words to him were these:

"Then, Mr. Secretary, we are agreed that we did not come to any agreement, but I hope that each one will still continue to do his best for the Filipino people."

Thus ended my conferences with the Secretary of War, but I had not lost hope that once in the Philippines, whereto the Secretary and I had planned to come together, some agreement might be reached. As is known, the state of my health did not allow me to accompany Secretary Hurley on his trip to the Philippines. In everything I said to the Secretary of War, it was understood that it was subject to the approval of the legislature.

MY STAND ON THE PHILIPPINE PROBLEM

In conferences with some Senators, among them Senators KING and HAWES, some Representatives, and high officials of the administration, I expressed my opinion that the Philippine problem could be solved satisfactorily through any one of these three procedures:

First. Immediate establishment of an independent government, with free trade between America and the Philippines for a period of 10 years, limiting the amount of sugar entering the United States free of duty to 1,000,000 tons, and of oil to the amount that is exported at present, and restriction of labor immigration into the United States.

Second. Immediate establishment of an autonomous government with all the consequent powers, including that of enacting measures considered necessary to meet the responsibilities of an independent government, when independence is granted with the restrictions necessary to safeguard the rights of sovereignty of the United States in the Philippines. For a period of 10 years the trade relations between the United States and the Philippines and the labor immigration into the United States would be governed as stated in the first plan. At the end of 10 years absolute independence of the Philippines will be granted, or the Filipino people will decide through a plebiscite whether they desire to continue with this kind of government or prefer to have one that is absolutely independent. In the latter event independence shall be granted forthwith.

Third. If neither of these plans protecting Philippine economic interests shall be acceptable to Congress, I said that the Filipino people would, as a matter of course, accept any law granting independence even under the most burdensome conditions.

The first plan found no acceptance in any quarter.

Even Senator KING (the American Senator who has been fighting for Philippine independence with the greatest zeal and disinterestedness) told me that the American people would never consent to the continuance of free trade between America and the Philippines in any form after independence has been granted us. This view is shared by all.

As to immediate independence it will be remembered that Senator HAWES himself, in answer to Secretary Stimson at the Senate hearings, stated that no one in the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs was in favor of immediate independence.

The second plan is the same idea embodied in the Hawes-Cutting bill, with the difference that the period for free trade is maintained for 10 years, while under the Hawes-Cutting bill from the second year duties will be levied at such a rate as would practically prevent the exportation of sugar, oil, and tobacco from the Philippines to the United States. In consequence of this extension of time as to trade relations, the date for independence or the plebiscite which is provided in the said Hawes-Cutting bill is also extended to 10 years.

It will perhaps be said that I deviated from the platform of my party in suggesting this second plan. I do not agree with this view. On the contrary, I think that my stand is fundamentally the same taken so far by the Nacionalista-Consolidado Party. But granting that it does not, I would not back out. This is one of the situations in which the leader of a party or a people has to decide whether to follow literally the platform of his party or to deviate somewhat from it because the prevailing circumstances and the welfare of his people so demand. My duty, as I honestly understand it, is not to stand pat on the platform of my party if in so doing I am convinced that the result would be either failure to accomplish anything in the interests of my people or to secure something injurious to them. The affairs of government are eminently practical—not theoretical. Those who have the responsibility of guiding the destinies of a nation have the solemn duty of harmonizing the lofty ideals of their people with the realities.

In all sincerity I must confess I am deeply apprehensive about the effects that the immediate termination of free trade with America will have upon our economic and social life. Especially do I feel thus because of the present world depression. The barring from the American markets of the products of industries which were created and stimulated under the shelter of a protective American tariff can not but affect our commerce. And consequently there will be a lowering of wages and a reduction in the income of the government, which is already being curtailed by the present depression. In a word, I am of the firm belief that with a sudden and abrupt termination of free trade with America there will be created here a situation of extreme difficulty for the people and the government of the Philippines. And it is not just to impose on us this hardship.

The Philippine Assembly opposed free trade between America and the Philippines on the ground that inasmuch as the Filipino people wanted to be free and independent there should not be created relations with America that would make us dependent upon the United States. Despite such opposition the American Congress passed the law establishing free trade between the two countries. It is only just, therefore, that we should be given a reasonable time in which to sever, without serious disturbance, this economic bond imposed upon us.

NET CERTAIN THAT THE NEXT CONGRESS WILL ACT ON PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE QUESTION

As a result of the last elections in the United States, the line-up of the political parties in the next Congress will be evenly balanced. With regard to the Philippine question, however, it is the prevailing opinion in Washington that should it be put to a vote, there would be a very large majority in favor of independence. This opinion is based upon the fact that the combined votes of the Democrats who have always favored independence, the Progressives, and the regular Republicans who come from districts where sugar, dairy, and labor interests are politically influential would constitute a substantial majority. However, no one can say with certainty that Congress will act on the Philippine problem. Domestic and foreign questions of great import now confront the Government and people of the United States, and these questions will doubtless receive prior consideration. Hence the Philippines may not receive consideration at this time.

The President of the United States has not so far revealed publicly what his attitude would be in case an independence bill should be passed by Congress. It is the consensus of opinion among Members of Congress with whom I have spoken on the matter that if the President should veto such a bill there would not be a sufficient number of votes to override his veto.

SUGGESTIONS

The poor state of my health compels me, after the submission of this report, to resign as president of the senate and as head of the Nacionalista-Consolidado Party. For this reason, I entertain serious doubts whether, at a time when the leadership of the senate and of the majority party will soon pass into other hands, it would be proper for me to express views that might embarrass those who are to succeed me. Let me therefore ask you to be indulgent and consider what I am about to say as mere suggestions.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF THE UNITED STATES

We should carry on our campaign in the United States with prudence and discretion. I do not believe that America resents the Filipinos' desire for independence. The American people are liberty loving, and to the blessings of freedom they owe their prosperity and happiness. Independence has been promised us, and it is natural that we should strive for it. But let us be careful not to say or do anything which might create the impression in America that our demand for independence is due to a lack of appreciation of what America has done for us or to a dislike for Americans. We shall be particularly careful to avoid this, because, as a matter of fact, our people are grateful to America, and we are friendly to the Americans.

Let us always remember that America's friendship, even after our independence has been recognized, will be most beneficial to us. In recent years the most powerful nations of Europe and of Asia, when faced by critical situations, have had to seek the help of the United States.

MISSION TO THE UNITED STATES

I am of the opinion that the Philippine Legislature should immediately send a mission to the United States. The situation demands, more than ever, that such a mission should be headed by the responsible leaders of the Filipino people. If I were to continue as the national leader and my health permitted it, I would return immediately to the United States. But I am practically an invalid. To go now would risk my life without being able to render any service to the country, and the sacrifice would be useless. If some nonofficial representatives of the community could go to the United States at their own expense, their presence in America would be helpful. I believe that the mission should not content itself with supporting bills presented by Senators or Representatives of the United States unless such bills are wholly satisfactory to us. The mission, in my opinion, should formulate and submit its own plan, which should cover in detail all the aspects of the Philippine question—political, economic, and international. If no United States Senator or Representative should sponsor such a plan, at least we would have made known what we honestly and sincerely believe to be the best solution of the Philippine problem. This does not mean that the Philippine Legislature should give specific instructions to the mission; on the contrary, I believe that the mission should be given a vote of confidence in order to be able to act with entire freedom and to get the best out of any situation that may arise. In this way, if the plan submitted by the mission should not meet with support in Congress, the mission still would be in a position to indorse whatever bill would be most beneficial to us.

SITUATION WHICH THE MISSION HAS TO FACE

I wish to make known and to present clearly to the Filipino people the situation which the mission will have to face.

On the one hand are the reactionary elements, those Americans who want America to remain here for an indefinite time, ruling us with a strong hand. They will certainly present a formidable battle, and they have on their side the majority of the newspapers with the largest circulation. I believe their representatives in Congress will resort to every manner of parliamentary device in order to block final action on any liberal Philippine legislation. And, as stated before, with so many important questions of domestic and international character demanding the attention of the American Government, it would not be difficult for them to attain their object. In other words, the first danger which threatens us is that we may not get anything, that we may not take any forward step whatever.

On the other hand are the interests which consider themselves affected by the free entry of certain Filipino products. They want this importation to cease immediately. Then there are the labor organizations which are determined to exclude Filipino immigration. While both of these elements are responsible for arousing in recent years interest in Congress on the Philippine question, we should not forget that their main purpose is not so much to free the Filipino people from American control as to free themselves from the competition of Philippine products and Filipino immigrants. If these elements could have their own way in fixing the terms and conditions under which independence is to be granted us, they would proceed without a single thought of the consequences which a sudden termination of free trade between America and the Philippines would bring about. In other words, the second danger against which we should be warned is that independence, if granted us, might be granted under burdensome conditions.

The third danger—the most unjust to us—is that no independence bill in any form may be passed, but the free entry of our products into the United States may be restricted and Filipino immigration prohibited.

WHAT I WOULD DO

What I would do if I were to face such a situation would be the following:

First. I would try to obtain immediate, absolute, and complete independence, with free trade between America and the Philippines for 10 years. I would strive for safeguards for the independence and integrity of Philippine territory through a treaty entered into by the great powers of the world. If this plan failed—

Second. I would strive for the fixing of a period necessary for our economic readjustment, after which the Filipino people will be given absolute independence, or will be free to choose whether they will have independence or not. During such period of economic readjustment the government of the Philippines will be autonomous, with a chief executive elected by the people, and with such powers as may be necessary to take all the measures designed to promote the country's political, economic, cultural, and social development, in keeping with the needs and the genius of the Filipino people. I would give my consent to the intervention and control of America over those matters which directly or indirectly might affect our international relations until the complete separation between the two countries shall have been effected.

Third. If I saw that none of the plans above outlined had any probability of being approved, I would support any measure which would insure some action by the next Congress on the Philippine question. This means that I would accept immediate, absolute, and complete independence without free trade or any other plan that would put an end to the present uncertainty and American control of our government and which will bring us nearer to the full attainment of our national ideals.

PROBLEMS OF LOCAL CHARACTER

Not only because the revenues of the government have already been impaired by the business depression, but also because of new responsibilities which we may have to assume, we should proceed immediately to study how to cut down the expenses of the government of the Philippines and to reduce the salaries of our officials in proportion to the resources of our country. I am gratified to know that the legislature already has taken the first steps to this end.

We should not encourage the further expansion of industries which depend upon the protected American market. Existing industries should reduce the cost of production and strive to be in a position to compete in the markets of the world. New products of local consumption and those which do not depend on American protection are the needs of the future.

With respect to our laborers, I believe that for the present, at least, they should prefer to stay in the Philippines, because their work is needed here more than ever before for the development of our natural resources. Furthermore, in the United States there are many millions of unemployed Americans, and it is not easy for the Filipinos to find employment. I was informed that many Filipinos were without jobs and in extreme misery to the extent that as a result they have been taken ill and have died. No Filipino laborer should go to America or anywhere else in search of work unless he is assured of employment or has the means with which to support himself until he can find work, and, in case of failure, enough for his fare back home.

THE SECRETARIES OF STATE AND WAR AND THE RESIDENT COMMISSIONERS

I wish to render public testimony of my appreciation of the courtesies of Secretary Stimson and Secretary Hurley extended to me during my stay in Washington. Although I did not come to any agreement with them, I must say that, in my opinion, they are sincerely interested in the welfare of the Filipino people.

Resident Commissioners GUEVARA and OSIAS lent me their loyal cooperation. These two Commissioners are doing excellent work in the United States. The Philippine Legislature in reelecting them has merely done them justice and acted in accordance with the best interest of our country.

CONCLUSION

I wish to make public recognition of the benefits that our people have received from the United States. We owe much to America. The unprecedented progress of our country is the result of the joint efforts of Americans and Filipinos. I am, however, constrained to declare that, in the interests both of the United States and the Philippines, the present relation between them, which is that of the ruler over the subject, must terminate. Our relations with the American people, if there are to be any, must be inspired by the principle of self-determination and voluntary partnership.

It is only thus that an effective and cordial cooperation between America and the Philippines may be secured in a common design to promote the moral and material interests of both peoples.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. TYDINGS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Baltimore, Md., praying for the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

Mr. WATERMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on December 21, 1931, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 39) extending the time within which the War Policies Commission is required to submit its final report.

SURVEY OF INDIAN CONDITIONS

Mr. FRAZIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted a partial report (No. 25), pursuant to Senate Resolutions 79 and 308, Seventieth Congress, and Resolutions 263 and 416, Seventy-first Congress, relative to Indian tribal and trust funds, with especial reference to the Mescalero Apache Reservation of New Mexico, which was ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON SENATORIAL CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES (S. REPT. NO. 24)

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, from the Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures, I desire to file with the Senate a report pursuant to Senate Resolution No. 403 of the last Congress. I ask that it may be printed and a copy placed on the desk of each Senator, and that it also may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 24, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS AND EXPENDITURES OF ANTI-SMITH DEMOCRATS, 1928

Mr. NYE, from the Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures, submitted the following report, pursuant to Senate Resolution 403:

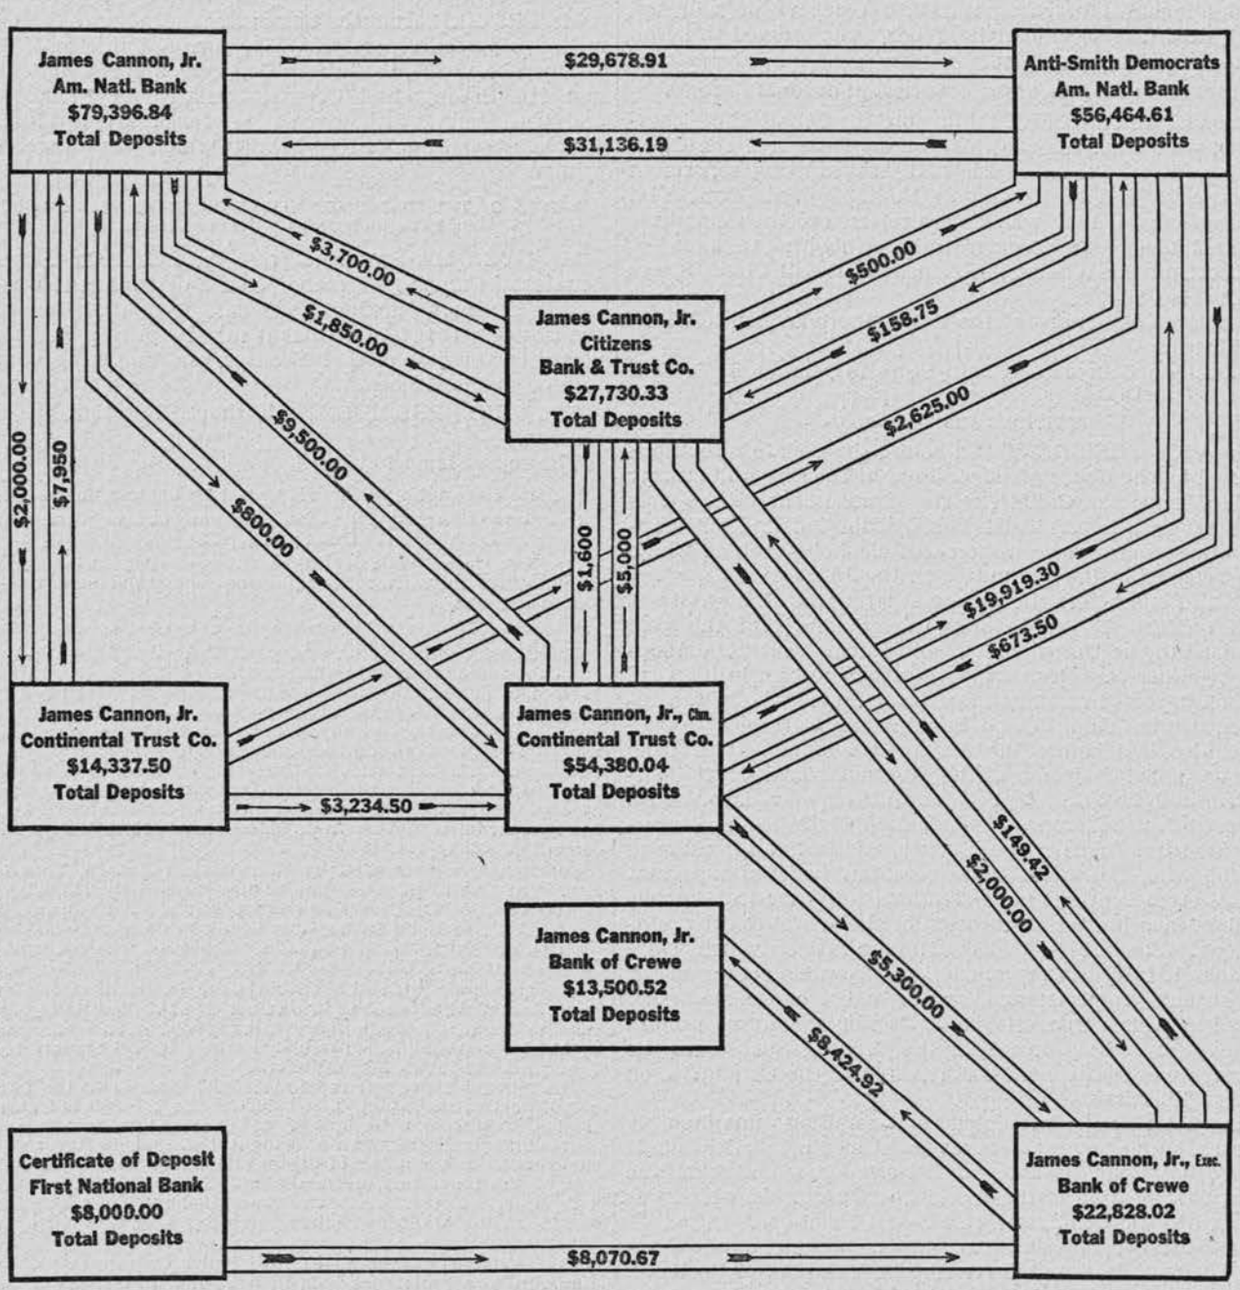
SELECT COMMITTEE ON SENATORIAL CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

The Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures was authorized and directed by the provisions of Senate Resolution 403 (agreed to January 5, 1931) "to investigate any complaint made before such committee by any responsible person or persons, alleging (1) the violation, at any time within two years preceding the adoption of the aforesaid resolution, of any provision of the Federal corrupt practices act, 1925, involving a false statement of campaign expenditures, or (2) a fraudulent conversion to private uses, at any time within such period of two years, of any campaign funds contributed for use in any election as defined in the Federal corrupt practices act, 1925."

Such charges were filed by Hon. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM, a Representative in Congress, under date of January 21, 1931, alleging violation of the Federal corrupt practices act by Bishop James Cannon, jr., and requesting specifically examination of the disposition of contributions amounting to $65,300 received from E. C. Jameson, of New York.

In accordance with the authorization and directions of the resolution above referred to, the committee assigned its representatives to conduct a preliminary investigation of the charges filed by Mr. TINKHAM and held public hearings upon February 11, May 7, and August 25, 26, 27, and 28, 1931.

The charges above referred to related primarily to the handling of political contributions made during the presidential campaign of 1928 to a committee known as the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, which sought to influence the results of the election in a number of States and which was, therefore, subject to the provisions of the Federal corrupt practices act, 1925. The officers of this committee were Bishop James Cannon, jr., chairman; Rev. J. Sidney Peters, secretary; Miss Ada L. Burroughs, treasurer.



The headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, was formed pursuant to a conference held in Asheville, N. C., on July 18 and 19, 1928, in response to a "call" issued in the names of Bishop James Cannon, jr., and Rev. A. J. Barton. The purpose of the organization, as stated both in the "call" and in the formal "declaration" issued by the conference, was "the election of dry Democratic senatorial, congressional, and State nominees and the defeat of the wet Tammany candidate for President." Hundreds of thousands of copies of the "declaration" containing this statement were printed by the headquarters committee, and it was used in connection with the solicitation of campaign contributions, including the funds solicited and received from E. C. Jameson.

The fact that the headquarters committee was active in a number of States and that its funds were solicited for the purpose of influencing the election of Senators and Representatives, as well as the presidential candidate, is cited in order that it may be clear that the transactions of this organization are clearly subject to the provisions of the Federal corrupt practices act and within the jurisdiction of a committee duly authorized to conduct inquiries by the United States Senate.

any of the books and papers which had been previously produced in response to lawfully issued subpœnas and asking further that the testimony already existing both in written and printed form be destroyed. After a brief hearing, in which the committee was represented by Mr. Elisha Hanson as counsel, this petition was promptly denied by Judge Joseph W. Cox.

The treasurer of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, Miss Ada L. Burroughs, upon being summoned to appear as

Accounts and Special Deposits of James Cannon, Jr. and Anti-Smith Democrats

The investigations of the committee have, nevertheless, been greatly impeded by the attitude of the officers of the headquarters committee, who are the only persons having first-hand knowledge of the transactions of that organization. The chairman of the committee, Bishop James Cannon, jr., has persistently challenged the jurisdiction of the Senate Committee on Campaign Expenditures, as he previously challenged the jurisdiction of the Senate Lobby Investigating Committee. In the midst of the committee's investigations suit was filed by him in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia petitioning for a writ of prohibition to prevent the committee from taking further testimony or examining a witness on May 7, 1931, likewise challenged the jurisdiction of the committee and persistently refused to answer any of the questions propounded to her. These questions, all of which related to the contributions and expenditures of a political committee operating in two or more States, are set forth upon pages 71 to 75 of the hearings of this committee held on May 7, 1931.

After the investigations of the Senate committee had revealed numerous apparent violations of the Federal corrupt practices act and many unexplained discrepancies between the bank accounts in which political funds were deposited and the reports rendered on behalf of the headquarters committee to the Clerk of the House,

Miss Burroughs was again subpœnaed by the committee and appeared as a witness on August 27, 1931, but again refused to testify. After certain specific questions clearly within the jurisdiction of the committee had been propounded, Miss Burroughs was asked:

"The CHAIRMAN. Are you declining to answer any questions relating to the receipts and expenditures of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats?

"Miss BURROUGHS. Yes."

Miss Burroughs's attention was directed to the fact that subsequent to her first appearance before the committee the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia had refused to grant the petition filed by Bishop Cannon challenging the jurisdiction of the committee and requesting a writ of prohibition against its further proceedings. She was also warned by the chairman as to the possible legal consequences of her refusal to testify.

The secretary of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, Rev. J. Sidney Peters, was also summoned as a witness before the Senate committee on August 28, 1931. Mr. Peters appeared in response to the committee's subpœna, but declined to answer any questions, either general or specific, relating to the receipts and expenditures of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats.

It had previously been shown by the testimony before this committee that Mr. Peters was not only an officer of the headquarters committee but also that he was in charge of its work during the absence of Bishop Cannon, had full knowledge of its activities, and personally participated in the solicitation and expenditure of its funds. Mr. Peters's testimony was particularly desired by the committee in order to establish the facts with reference to the solicitation by mail of contributions to pay off an alleged deficit of some $6,500, which was more than covered by two contributions totaling $7,300 made by Mr. E. C. Jameson subsequent to the close of the campaign.

In view, however, of the fact that the constitutional grounds upon which Miss Burroughs and Mr. ePters refused to testify have been made the basis for a demurrer in the case of United States v. Cannon and Burroughs, a decision upon which is now pending in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the committee does not at this time recommend any action by the Senate. Such action can be taken when the constitutional question has been judicially determined.

The committee's investigation was also rendered difficult by the fact that the books and records of the headquarters committee were not accessible and that more than two years had elapsed since the date of transactions under consideration. As a result telegrams, records of telephone messages, and detailed bank records, all of which are customarily destroyed at the end of a year, were unavailable. Substantially the only records available were, therefore, the reports filed by the treasurer of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, with the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the bank statements and deposit slips of the several bank accounts in which the committee has ascertained, after tedious and difficult investigation, that political funds collected by or on behalf of the Anti-Smith Democrats had been deposited. The task was also complicated by reason of the fact that Bishop Cannon received a large part of the funds which he handled during the campaign in the form of cash, the disposition of which it is practically impossible to trace.

Nevertheless, through the painstaking and patient work of Mr. Basil Manly, who acted as special assistant to the committee in this investigation, and that of Mr. Edward M. Daniel and Mr. W. Hunter Baldwin, it was found possible, even with these fragmentary records, to prepare a substantially complete analysis of the sources and disposition of these funds.

The evidence before the committee shows that, although Miss Ada L. Burroughs was the nominal treasurer of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, the funds of that organization were in fact largely handled by the chairman, Bishop James Cannon, jr.

On July 24, 1928, soon after the formation of the committee, an account was opened with the American National Bank (now American Bank & Trust Co.), Richmond, Va., in the name of "Anti-Smith Democrats," checks to be signed by the treasurer, A. L. Burroughs, and countersigned by the chairman, James Cannon, jr. This was the only account, so far as this committee has been able to determine, which stood in the name of the Anti-Smith Democrats or any affiliated or subsidiary organization and to which Miss Burroughs, as treasurer, had access.

The funds which were secured as contributions to the Anti-Smith Democrats were, however, deposited either during the campaign or after its close in a number of other accounts, all of which were subject to check or withdrawal only by James Cannon, jr. In all, 10 accounts were utilized in connection with the handling of these funds:

1. Account of the "Anti-Smith Democrats" in the American National Bank, Richmond, Va.

2. Account of James Cannon, jr., American National Bank, Richmond, Va. This was a personal account of long standing.

3. Account of James Cannon, jr., Continental Trust Co., Washington, D. C. This was a political account, opened on August 6, 1928.

4. Account of James Cannon, jr., chairman, Continental Trust Co., Washington, D. C. This was also a political account, to which the balance of the preceding account was transferred on October 11, 1928.

5. Account of James Cannon, jr., Citizens Bank & Trust Co., Blackstone, Va. This was a personal account of long standing.

6. Certificate of deposit in name of James Cannon, jr., Citizens Bank & Trust Co., Blackstone, Va. This was a time deposit of political funds withdrawn from the account of James Cannon, jr., chairman, in the Continental Trust Co., ultimately transferred to the personal account of James Cannon, jr., in the same bank.

7. Certificate of deposit in name of James Cannon, jr., First National Bank, Blackstone, Va. This was a time deposit of $8,000 of political funds received from E. C. Jameson, ultimately transferred to account of James Cannon, jr., executor.

8. Certificate of deposit in name of James Cannon, jr., executor, in Bank of Crewe, Crewe, Va. This was a time deposit of political funds withdrawn from the account of James Cannon, jr., chairman, in the Continental Trust Co., ultimately transferred to savings account of James Cannon, jr., executor, in the same bank.

9. Account of James Cannon, jr., executor, Bank of Crewe, Crewe, Va. This was a savings account in which political funds received from Jameson and withdrawn from the account of James Cannon, jr., chairman, were deposited.

10. Account of James Cannon, jr., Bank of Crewe, Crewe, Va. This was a savings account to which funds were transferred from the account of James Cannon, jr., executor, in the same bank.

As an aid to understanding the complex interrelations of the several accounts the committee submits herewith a diagram (Chart A) which was placed in evidence during its hearings.

Except for the two long-standing personal accounts in the American National Bank and the Citizens' Bank & Trust Co., these several accounts were opened by Bishop Cannon during or soon after the close of the campaign and became the depository of the political funds in varying amounts. In addition, Bishop Cannon maintained a safe-deposit box in the American National Bank at Richmond, Va., to which Miss Burroughs had access as his deputy and to which there were frequent entries both by Bishop Cannon and Miss Burroughs during the period of the campaign. It would appear reasonable, as indicated by Bishop Cannon's testimony before the lobby investigating committee (p. 4834), that this box was used as the depository for some of the large amounts of cash which were received as campaign contributions, a total of $27,550 in cash having been secured from E. C. Jameson alone.

The account in the Continental Trust Co. was opened originally on August 6, 1928, in the name of James Cannon, jr. In opening this account Bishop Cannon wrote to Mr. C. W. Warden, vice president of the Continental Trust Co.:

"It is thought wise to keep three separate accounts of the expenditures of our committee to defeat Al Smith, and I have decided to open one of these three accounts with the Continental Trust Co. * * * Send me pocket check book, as there will probably be checks made on the account of such amounts as will be needed to meet special work and not small bills."

Later, on October 11, 1928, a new account was opened in the Continental Trust Co. in the name of "James Cannon, jr., chairman," to which the entire balance then remaining in the account of James Cannon, jr., was transferred.

Analysis of the funds passing through these two accounts reveals the following results as regards the source and disposition of the moneys:

Analysis of accounts of James Cannon, jr., and James Cannon, jr., chairman, Continental Trust Co.

DISPOSITION OF WITHDRAWALS

James Cannon, jr.:
Deposited in personal account, American National Bank	$17,450.00
Certificate of deposit, Citizens Bank & Trust Co	5,000.00
Certificate of deposit, Bank of Crewe	5,300.00
Paid on personal note, First National Bank	528.00
		28,278.00
Anti-Smith Democrats		22,544.30
Unaccounted for		17,895.24
Total		68,717.54

Eliminating duplications arising from transfers from one account to another, the total amount of political contributions handled by Bishop Cannon and Miss Burroughs during or immediately following the presidential campaign of 1928 appears to have aggregated approximately $133,000.

This total was made up of the following items:

Deposited to account of Anti-Smith Democrats, American National Bank, Richmond, Va. ($58,708.61), less $17,300 credited to Jameson contribution, Feb. 11, 1929, duplicating deposits in Continental Trust Co. and cash contributions	$41,408.61

Deposited to accounts of James Cannon, jr., and James Cannon, jr., chairman, in the Continental Trust Co., Washington, D. C. ($68,717.54), less amounts ($22,544.30) transferred to Anti-Smith Democrats' account	$46,173.24
Certificate of deposit in First National Bank, Blackstone, Va., James Cannon, jr	8,000.00
Cash received from E. C. Jameson	27,550.00
Cash received from Joseph S. Frelinghuysen	10,000.00
Total	133,131.85

The amount can not be exactly determined from the available evidence, because of the fact that a large number of deposits, ranging in amounts from $1 to $500, listed in the account of James Cannon, jr., in the Citizens Bank & Trust Co., which appear to be campaign contributions, can not be positively identified as such without locating and examining the contributors. (See testimony of Booker, hearings, pp. 101–102.)

Of this aggregate of $133,000, by far the largest amount was contributed by Mr. E. C. Jameson, of New York. In all, Mr. Jameson contributed a total of $65,300 in the following amounts:

Date	Amount	Form in which received
Sept. 18, 1928	$10,000	Jameson checks.
Sept. 28, 1928	10,000	Cashier's checks, $9,750; cash, $250.
Oct. 9, 1928	10,000	Cash.
Oct. 16, 1928	5,000	Jameson check.
Do	5,000	Do.
Oct. 19, 1928	10,000	Cash.
Do	8,000	Cashier's check.
Dec. 6, 1928	4,300	Cash.
Jan. 14, 1929	3,000	Do.
	65,300

The committee has been impressed with the fact that, although other political contributions which Mr. Jameson made during the presidential campaign of 1928, amounting to more than $100,000, were drawn to the order of the treasurers of the respective organizations, none of the checks above referred to were drawn either in the name of the treasurer or any organization. With the exception of the two checks for $5,000 each, dated October 16, which were drawn to the order of James Cannon, jr., all the checks above listed were drawn to the order of "cash," "bearer," or some other anonymous designation. The committee's investigation further shows that $27,550 of the above contributions was immediately converted into cash by Bishop Cannon or by Mr. Jameson's secretary at Bishop Cannon's request.

Of the $65,300 contributed by Mr. Jameson, $29,750 was deposited in the accounts of James Cannon, jr., and James Cannon, jr., chairman, in the Continental Trust Co.; $8,000 was placed upon certificate of deposit to the credit of James Cannon, jr., in the First National Bank, Blackstone, Va., and $27,550 was converted into cash, the final disposition of which the committee has found it impossible to determine.

There are several points connected with the Jameson contributions with reference to which the committee was unable to secure any satisfactory explanation. In the first place, although the first of the Jameson checks for $10,000 was dated September 18, 1928, the letter from Bishop Cannon soliciting contributions from Mr. Jameson, and which would appear upon its face to be the first communication upon the subject, is dated September 19, 1928. The office stamp upon the back shows that it was actually received upon September 20. Mr. Jameson was unable to explain how it was that he made this large contribution before he received Bishop Cannon's request.

A possible explanation may be found in a telegram dated September 8, 1928, from the late James W. Good, western manager of the Republican campaign, to Mr. Jameson, which read:

"Bascom Slemp is working on a plan for independent organization, and we are anxious to carry out this plan. He will talk with you about it. Please give him all the assistance possible."

To this Mr. Jameson replied on September 11:

"Your telegram received. I had a talk with Bascom Slemp and Senator Frelinghuysen yesterday, and he is fixed up so that he can go ahead and work out the independent organization as planned."

Mr. Jameson could not recall what independent organization was discussed, but Mr. Slemp testified that he saw Mr. Jameson about this time and talked to him about Bishop Cannon's work. (Hearings, pp. 78 and 81.)

Another unexplained transaction, indicating the receipt of funds from Mr. Slemp, which are not accounted for in the reports filed with the Clerk of the House, is referred to in a letter which Bishop Cannon, under date of October 13, 1928, wrote Mr. Jameson, as follows:

"I am also writing to tell you that Mr. Slemp has already paid three-quarters of the amount that he pledged the other morning, and he promises to have all of it in our hands by Monday; so that is cared for. It is very important that I get the balance on Friday, the 19th. I hope to be able to be in New York at that time and would prefer to have it all in cash. I hope that arrangement will be satisfactory to you."

Although both Mr. Jameson and Mr. Slemp were closely examined by the committee with reference to the amount "pledged by Mr. Slemp," neither of them was able to give any satisfactory explanation. The letter clearly implies that Mr. Jameson had knowledge of some amount pledged by Mr. Slemp, but Mr. Jameson was unable to recall any such transaction. (Hearings, p. 242.) Mr. Slemp suggested that it might refer to a contribution of $7,500 which he had made, $5,000 of which was sent to Richmond to be used in cooperation with Bishop Cannon. When his attention was directed to the fact that this transaction occurred early in August, more than two months prior to the letter above quoted, Mr. Slemp stated that he could not explain it. (Hearings, p. 86.)

All of the total amount of $65,300 contributed by E. C. Jameson, except $3,000, was paid before January 1, 1929, and under the provisions of the Federal corrupt practices act should have been reported in the statements filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives during the campaign and on January 1, 1929. None of this money was so reported and, in the opinion of the committee, this failure to report any of these contributions upon the dates specified in section 305 constitutes a violation of the act.

None of it was reported in any way until Senator STEIWER, chairman of the committee on presidential campaign expenditures, wrote Mr. Jameson on February 8, 1929, asking him for a complete list of his contributions. On February 12 Bishop Cannon telegraphed Mr. Jameson, who was then in Florida:

"After careful examination records, think statement should be 'paid headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, $17,300. Paid Virginia committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, $48,000, making total $65,300.' This will correspond with our official reports."

On February 11, 1929, the day before Bishop Cannon sent the above telegram to Mr. Jameson, a check for $17,300 was drawn upon the personal account of James Cannon, jr., in the American National Bank of Richmond to the order of the Anti-Smith Democrats and an entry was made by Miss Burroughs in her accounts:

"February 11. Received from James Cannon, jr., donation of E. C. Jameson, New York, $17,000."

The discrepancy of $300 between the amount which Miss Burroughs entered in her statement and the amount of the check as drawn and as stated in Bishop Cannon's telegram of February 12, 1929, may be noted.

At the same time a check for substantially the same amount, $17,364.11, was drawn on the account of the anti-Smith Democrats and deposited in Bishop Cannon's personal account. That this was a mere "wash transaction" is clearly indicated by the fact that at the time these checks, amounting to more than $17,000 each were drawn, the balance in the account of James Cannon, jr., was only $549.81, while the Anti-Smith Democrat account shows an overdraft of $81.62.

In accounting for the payment of more than $17,000 to Bishop Cannon upon February 11, Miss Burroughs made entries in her account filed with the Clerk of the House, as follows:

Feb. 11.	James Cannon, jr., refund for money advanced anti-Smith Democrats in North Carolina	$5,000.00
	James Cannon, jr., refund for money paid Guardian Publishing Co., Richmond, printing	4,926.29
	James Cannon, jr., refund on money advanced to L. C. Branscomb, Anniston, Ala., for publicity work	200.00
	James Cannon, jr., refund on money advanced to Rev. Bob Jones, Florida, for travel expenses	250.00
	James Cannon, jr., for cash advanced by him from time to time to meet current expenses	6,394.46
	James Cannon, jr., refund on money advanced to Dr. A. C. Millar, Little Rock, Ark., for advertising and publicity	537.36

The investigations of the committee threw considerable light upon some of these items entered as refunds. With reference to the refund of $5,000 for money advanced to the Anti-Smith Democrats of North Carolina, W. H. Wood, who acted as treasurer of that committee in North Carolina, testified under oath before the committee that the $5,000 which he received from Bishop Cannon was drawn upon the International Germanic Trust Co., of New York. A deposit slip showing deposit of a check for $5,000 drawn upon this bank was placed in evidence. With the information furnished by Mr. Wood the committee traced this check to the account of Claudius H. Huston, subsequently chairman of the Republican National Committee. Later, when Bishop Cannon stated that he had received no money from Mr. Huston, Mr. Wood upon a rechecking of his bank statement ascertained that an additional check in the amount of $5,000 was received by him at about the same time, drawn against the account of James Cannon, jr., chairman, in the Continental Trust Co., of Washington, D. C., and so informed the committee by letter. In either event, it is clear that the $5,000 which was sent to Mr. Wood did not represent a personal advance of funds by Bishop Cannon.

Furthermore it may be noted that the report which had been filed by Miss Burroughs under date of December 31, 1928, had listed no unpaid obligations and had stated that the amount due on loans was $7,004.31, whereas, on February 11, 1929, alleged refunds amounting to $17,308.11 were listed as having been paid to Bishop Cannon.

The committee has been impressed also with certain peculiarities which appear upon the face of the reports filed by the treasurer of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the Federal corrupt practices act, 1925. It is noted that almost without exception the items appearing in those reports relating to alleged loans from James Cannon, jr., are entered in such manner as to indicate that they were inserted at a different time and sometimes upon a different typewriter from that used in the preparation of the body of the report. There is also a discrepancy between the reports bearing the same date filed with the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate, although they should have been exact duplicates. It is noted also that these reports list contributions alleged to have been received in amounts of less than $100 in totals considerably exceeding the aggregate amount of deposits in items of less than $100 during the same period in the various bank accounts.

In viewing these omissions and discrepancies in the official reports which were filed on behalf of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, the committee has been impressed by the suggestion appearing in a letter dated September 15, 1928, addressed by Bishop Cannon to Mr. W. C. Gregg, of Hackensack, N. J., which read in part as follows:

"Referring to the fact that all funds which are used under the auspices of the Anti-Smith Democrats must be reported by our treasurer as used for political purposes, I would say that if you prefer that your contributions should not appear in the report of the committee, it can be utilized in the literature campaign of the Board of Temperance and Social Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, which can concentrate to that extent to the amount of $500 especially in Tennessee.

"We are carrying on two kinds of work. Through our board of temperance and social service we are distributing literature which emphasizes very strongly the prohibition issue without calling the names of the candidates, but making, in my judgment, equally as effective an appeal for Mr. Hoover and against Smith as the literature which backs up directly the personal candidacy." (Hearings, p. 266.)

This letter, which was written early in the campaign, would appear to indicate the existence of a plan by which funds contributed to influence the result of the election would not appear in the official reports of the organization.

Reverting to the statement in Bishop Cannon's telegram to Mr. Jameson, of February 12, 1929, that $48,000 of the Jameson contributions was "paid Virginia committee, Anti-Smith Democrats," the committee has been unable to discover any substantial evidence to indicate that there was in fact a separate committee of Anti-Smith Democrats for the State of Virginia. On the contrary, the testimony of witnesses before the committee who were in a position to have knowledge of the facts was to the effect that there was no such organization and that all matters relating to the campaign in Virginia were handled out of the office of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats. The correspondence which passed between Bishop Cannon and Mr. Jameson, soliciting his contributions, is written upon the stationery of the headquarters committee, and the language used in the various letters indicates clearly that the Jameson contributions were being solicited for general use throughout the South. (Hearings, pp. 221, 225, 227, 228, 262.) Mr. Jameson testified that he had no knowledge of any separate Virginia committee (hearings, p. 230), and that he had made his contributions generally to the Anti-Smith Democrats (hearings, p. 228).

During his appearance before the committee Mr. Jameson was asked:

"The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Jameson, if you had not received from James Cannon, jr., the telegram suggesting how you should or how he would like to have you make your report of your contributions to him, how would you have reported these contributions?

"Mr. JAMESON. I do not know; I can not answer that." (Hearings, p. 229.)

Further Mr. Jameson was asked:

"The CHAIRMAN. Prior to that telegram you had never heard, had you, of a separate Virginia committee?

"Mr. JAMESON. I do not remember of doing so."

In this connection it may be noted that the only accounting for the expenditure of the $48,000 alleged to have been contributed by Mr. Jameson to the Virginia committee was in the form of a public statement issued by Bishop Cannon and published in newspapers of June 5, 1930, which read in part as follows:

"The $48,300 contributed by Mr. Jameson used in the Virginia State campaign was applied as follows: General purposes of State work, including speakers, travel, automobiles, postage, etc. (round numbers), $16,000; for county and precinct organization, election-day work, etc., first congressional district, $2,000; second, $4,500; third, $6,500; fourth, $2,200; fifth, $4,000; sixth, $3,000; seventh, $3,000; eighth, $2,500; ninth, $2,100; tenth, $2,500; total, $48,300."

The discrepancy between the $48,300 here accounted for and the $48,000 stated as having been "paid Virginia committee, anti-Smith Democrats" in Bishop Cannon's telegram of February 12, 1929, may be noted.

During the hearing the committee had before it Dr. S. E. Hughes who, during the campaign of 1928, was chairman of the Anti-Smith Democrats in Danville, Va., the center of the fifth congressional district in which, according to the statement just quoted, $4,000 was spent. Doctor Hughes stated that he had no knowledge of any Virginia Anti-Smith Democrat committee other than the headquarters committee and that he received no funds for the campaign from Bishop Cannon.

His testimony was in part as follows:

"The CHAIRMAN. Did Bishop Cannon come into Danville during the campaign?

"Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir; he made one address there.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did you confer with Bishop Cannon at the time of his visit?

"Mr. HUGHES. Bishop Cannon had dinner with me the evening he was there.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did he say anything at the time as to the availability of money for use down there?

"Mr. HUGHES. If I remember correctly, he said to me he hoped we would be able to finance our own campaign in Danville; if we needed a little money we could call on him and he would see what he could do, but I do not think we ever called. That is my recollection.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did he give you or send you any money?

"Mr. HUGHES. He did not.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did you or your committee make any contributions to the headquarters committee at Richmond?

"Mr. HUGHES. Not that I know of.

"The CHAIRMAN. Or to Bishop Cannon?

"Mr. HUGHES. Not that I know of.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did you have knowledge of any other committee functioning in Virginia, any committee other than the headquarters committee at Richmond?

"Mr. HUGHES. No, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did you know anything of a Virginia Anti-Smith committee?

"Mr. HUGHES. I knew nothing at all about it except the committee in Richmond, the headquarters.

"The CHAIRMAN. That is all, Doctor. Thank you." (Hearings, p. 315.)

The committee also heard the testimony of Mr. H. G. Luhring, who was treasurer of the Greater Norfolk Anti-Smith Club, operating in the second congressional district, in which $4,500 is said to have been expended. Mr. Luhring testified that he knew of no Virginia Anti-Smith committee, except the headquarters committee (hearings, p. 311); that the only money which he received or of which he had knowledge as being received from Bishop Cannon or the Anti-Smith Democrats was the sum of $200 which he secured from Rev. J. Sidney Peters out of headquarters committee funds to assist in covering expenses of the Norfolk headquarters (hearings, p. 305, etc.). He stated that it would be hard for him to believe that $4,500 was expended in that district by the Anti-Smith Democrats in addition to what passed through his hands. (Hearings, p. 310.)

The committee is also impressed by the fact that the representatives of the Guardian Publishing Co., which did substantially all the printing used by the Anti-Smith Democrats during the campaign, stated that they had no knowledge of any committee except the headquarters committee and that al of the printing, including sample ballots for the State of Virginia, was ordered through the headquarters committee. (Hearings, pp. 291, 293.)

This impression is reinforced by the fact that the accounts of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, as reported to the Clerk of the House by Miss Burroughs, include a large number of items, which appear to relate exclusively to the conduct of the campaign in the State of Virginia, which would properly have been charged to and paid by the Virginia committee, if that committee had in fact been organized as a separate entity distinct from the headquarters committee. Among such items are, for example, expenses of Norfolk headquarters, expense of Fredericksburg (Va.) meeting, city of Richmond auditorium, rental of hall in Norfolk, copying of voting lists, political advertising in Virginia newspapers, auto hire for speakers in connection with Virginia meetings, and other similar items which appear to relate solely to the Virginia campaign.

In view, therefore, of these considerations, backed by the testimony of Doctor Hughes and Mr. Luhring that they knew of no separate Virginia committee nor of any considerable amounts of money sent into their districts by Bishop Cannon, your committee has been led to the conclusion that there was no separately organized Virginia committee of the Anti-Smith Democrats. This conclusion has been strengthened by the refusal of Rev. J. Sidney Peters and Miss Ada L. Burroughs to testify, although they occupied positions where they must have possessed knowledge of such an organization if it had maintained a separate existence.

Summarizing the facts which appear in the record with reference to the political funds handled by Bishop Cannon or Miss Burroughs during the campaign of 1928 or in connection with the payment of deficits alleged to have been created during that campaign, your committee finds:

1. That the total amount of such funds exceeded $130,000.

2. That of this total only $58,558.62 was accounted for in statements filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives in accordance with the provisions of the Federal corrupt practices act of 1925.

3. That all of this money, having been contributed to influence an election at which presidential electors and Senators and Representatives in Congress were elected, should have been accounted for in reports filed with the Clerk of the House in accordance with the provisions of the corrupt practices act requiring such reports to be filed:

(a) By a political committee operating in two or more States, or

(b) By a committee active in only one State if such a committee is a branch or subsidiary of a national committee, other than the national committee of a political party.

The Virginia committee of the Anti-Smith Democrats, if it did in fact exist, was clearly a subsidiary of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, and any funds received or expended in its behalf should, therefore, have been reported.

4. That none of the $62,300 contributed by E. C. Jameson prior to January 1, 1929, was accounted for in any of the reports required by the Federal corrupt practices act to be filed with the Clerk of the House during the progress of the campaign and upon January 1 of the following year.

5. That the so-called supplemental report, filed by Miss Burroughs under date of February 11, 1929, which purported to account for the receipt of $17,000 from E. C. Jameson, was not a compliance with the requirements of the law or a disclosure of the total amount of the Jameson money which had actually been deposited in bank accounts of the Anti-Smith Democrats prior to that date. That this supplemental report was filed only as a result of inquiries made by the Senate committee, headed by Senator STEIWER, and was not, therefore, a voluntary attempt to rectify errors or omissions in the reports which had previously been filed.

6. That although Miss Burroughs was the nominal treasurer of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, a large part of the funds collected by or on behalf of that organization were in fact handled by the chairman, Bishop James Cannon, jr., who deposited such funds in accounts upon which he alone was able to draw checks, thus placing upon him a peculiar responsibility to see that the statements filed in accordance with the Federal corrupt practices act on behalf of such organization were accurate and complete.

7. That the reports of contributions and expenditures of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, as filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, do not check with the actual deposits and withdrawals shown by the bank statements as regards numerous important items.

DIVERSION OF POLITICAL FUNDS TO PRIVATE ACCOUNTS

Coming now to the second question which the committee was directed to investigate by the terms of Senate Resolution 403, namely, "A fraudulent conversion to private uses * * * of any campaign funds contributed for use in any election as defined in the Federal corrupt practices act, 1925," your committee finds that funds aggregating $18,300, representing moneys contributed for political purposes were placed on deposit to the credit of James Cannon, jr., or James Cannon, jr., executor, prior to the date of the general election in 1928 and remained on deposit to the credit of such accounts for considerable periods subsequent to that election.

In order to understand the transactions which resulted in the creation of these deposits it is necessary to review them in some detail.

On October 13, 1928, Bishop Cannon wrote Mr. E. C. Jameson on the letterhead of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, as follows:

"I am also writing to tell you that Mr. Slemp has already paid three-quarters of the amount that he pledged the other morning, and he promises to have all of it in our hands by Monday, so that is cared for. It is very important that I get the balance on Friday, the 19th. I hope to be able to be in New York at that time, and would prefer to have it all in cash. I hope that arrangement will be satisfactory to you."

On October 10, 1928, Bishop Cannon wrote Mr. Booker, cashier of the Citizens Bank & Trust Co., of Blackstone, Va., as follows:

"Am inclosing items for deposit.

"Suppose you ask Mr. Barrow if you and he can agree on this deposit of between $15,000 and $20,000 which is in my hands as chairman of the Newspaper Supply Co., an old subsidiary of the Richmond Virginian, could draw 4 per cent from time of deposit with pledge of 20 days' notice, or you pay only 3 per cent."

The Mr. Barrow referred to in the above letter is the president of the First National Bank of Blackstone, Va. This letter clearly implied that Bishop Cannon expected to deposit between $15,000 and $20,000, which he was holding as chairman of the Newspaper Supply Co.

The testimony of Mr. Jameson and Mr. Healey, Mr. Jameson's secretary, shows that on October 19 Bishop Cannon went to New York and secured from Mr. Jameson two checks, one for $10,000, representing the balance of $50,000 which Mr. Jameson had initially pledged to the Anti-Smith campaign, and a check for $8,000, an additional amount requested by Bishop Cannon. Mr. Jameson, questioned as to the purpose for which this $8,000 was contributed, testified as follows:

"The CHAIRMAN. Then you intended that the $8,000, as well as the $10,000, was for political purposes?

"Mr. JAMESON. Absolutely.

"The CHAIRMAN. And that was true, of course, of every dollar that you contributed to Mr. Cannon?

"Mr. JAMESON. Yes, sir; of course." (Hearings, p. 252.)

The testimony shows that the $10,000 check was exchanged for cash and that the $8,000 was exchanged for cashier's check of the Lawyers Trust Co., No. 9023, dated October 19 and drawn to "bearer."

This $8,000 cashier's check was in turn indorsed to S. L. Barrow, president; James Cannon, jr., chairman; James Cannon, jr., and then forwarded to Mr. Barrow by Bishop Cannon in a letter dated October 22, 1928, on the letterhead of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, in which he said:

"You will recall that Mr. Booker spoke to you a few days ago concerning placing on deposit certain funds of the Newspaper Supply Co. I was hoping that at least 4 per cent could be given on these deposits, but understand, of course, you do hesitate to break your rule. I am inclosing check for which please send me a time certificate of deposit, James Cannon, jr. I am sending Mr. Booker an equal amount. Yours sincerely, James Cannon, jr." (Hearings, p. 257.)

Receipt of this letter and check was acknowledged by Mr. Barrow on October 23 in a letter addressed to Bishop Cannon, in which he said:

"Your letter of October 22, 1928, and check for $8,000 received. As directed, we have issued certificate of deposit 35915 to your favor for $8,000 and send the same in this letter to you." (Hearings, p. 257.)

The certificate of deposit above referred to was in the following form:

$8,000 THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BLACKSTONE, VA.,
Blackstone, Va., October 23, 1928.

James Cannon, jr., has deposited in this bank $8,000, payable to the order of self, after 90 days' notice, on the return of this certificate properly indorsed with interest at 3 per cent per annum if remaining three months, no interest if left for shorter time but if remaining six months, or longer, 4 per cent per annum will be paid. This certificate may be called in after 10 days' notice, interest to cease from the date of service of notice.

No. 35915.

(Signed) E. J. BLOOMFIELD, Assistant Cashier.
S. L. BARROW, President.

(On the reverse thereof:)

Pay to the order of James Cannon, jr., executor, for deposit, Bank of Crewe.

(Signed) JAMES CANNON, Jr., Executor.

Pay to the order of any bank or banker; all prior indorsements guaranteed.

BANK OF CREWE,
F. W. SHEFFIELD, Cashier.

(Hearings, p. 54.)

It may be noted that this certificate of deposit was drawn "payable to the order of self," and that, although, according to the testimony of Mr. Jameson, this money was secured strictly for political purposes, it was deposited on a 90-day time certificate on October 23, 1928, less than two weeks before the end of the campaign.

The testimony of Mr. Barrow shows that this $8,000 remained on certificate of deposit from October 23, 1928, until February 8, 1929, at which time it was transferred, with accrued interest of $70.67, and placed to the credit of James Cannon, jr., executor, in the Bank of Crewe, Crewe, Va. Bishop Cannon's letter of February 6, transmitting this certificate asked that it be placed "to my credit in the savings account on deposit with the understanding that I can draw against it from time to time and the daily balance draw interest at 4 per cent." It may be noted that, although the certificate was made payable to "James Cannon, jr.," it was indorsed "James Cannon, jr., executor."

This $8,000 contributed by Mr. Jameson for political purposes on October 19, 1928, was thus held intact for more than three months after the end of the campaign in the form of a time-certificate deposit in the name of James Cannon, jr., and was then merged with other funds in a savings account standing in the name of James Cannon, jr., executor. It may be noted also that, although this money was originally represented to be funds of the Newspaper Supply Co., the certificate was ultimately deposited in the executor's account, the balance of which was in due course transferred to a personal account of James Cannon, jr., in the Bank of Crewe.

The second certificate of deposit, represented to be funds of the Newspaper Supply Co., was in the amount of $5,000 deposited in the Citizens Bank & Trust Co. This certificate was established by the use of political funds withdrawn from the account of James Cannon, jr., chairman, Continental Trust Co., Washington, D. C. Bishop Cannon's letter transmitting this money was as follows:

RICHMOND, VA., October 27, 1928.

DEAR MR. BOOKER: I am sending you draft for $5,000 for which send me certificate of deposit. This completes the $8,000. I have sent Mr. Barrow other $8,000. This money is held in trust by the Newspaper Supply Co., and I do not know how long it will be on deposit. Kindly send certificate to-night, and oblige.

Sincerely,

JAMES CANNON, Jr.

"Some additional checks for deposit.

"BANK'S FOOTNOTE.—Above check drawn by Continental Trust Co., dated October 27, 1928, on Washington, D. C., certificate No. 34994, dated October 29, 1928, issued—same paid and credited his account January 30, 1929." (Hearings, p. 105.)

This money likewise remained on time certificate, drawing interest until long after the end of the campaign, having been finally paid and credited with accrued interest of $37.50 to the personal account of James Cannon, jr., in the Citizens Bank & Trust Co., Blackstone, Va., on January 30, 1929.

It may be noted that in Bishop Cannon's letter to Mr. Booker he states: "This completes the $8,000. I have sent Mr. Barrow other $8,000." These deposits constituted, therefore, a total of $16,000. The balance of the $8,000 deposited in the Citizens Bank, the testimony shows, was in the form of a certificate of deposit No. 34970, dated October 16, 1928. This certificate for $3,000 was established in accordance with directions contained in a letter from Bishop Cannon to Mr. Booker, dated October 15, 1928, in which he said:

"I am inclosing in this check for $2,433.78. Add from my balance to this amount enough to make $3,000 and issue certificate of deposit for that amount. I will probably increase this later to $7,500 or $8,000."

It was further shown by the testimony of C. B. Stevens, of Charlottesville, Va., that this check for $2,433.78 represented a part of the proceeds of the sale of a house and lot belonging to the estate of Mrs. Mary C. Moore, of which Bishop Cannon was executor.

Thus, of the $16,000 placed on time certificate of deposit in the two banks at Blackstone and represented to be trust funds of the Newspaper Supply Co., $8,000 was a political contribution made by E. C. Jameson, of New York; $5,000 was a withdrawal of political funds deposited to the credit of James Cannon, jr., chairman, in the Continental Trust Co., of Washington; and $2,433.78 represented proceeds of the sale of property of an estate of which Bishop Cannon was executor. The balance, amounting to $566.22, was withdrawn from Bishop Cannon's personal account in the Citizens Bank to round out the total of $16,000.

Inquiry by representatives of the committee reveals that the Newspaper Supply Co. was a defunct corporation, the charter of which had been revoked for nonpayment of taxes seven years before the transactions above referred to took place. A certified copy of the revocation of the charter issued by the Corporation Commission of Virginia, dated June 6, 1921, appears in the printed record of the committee on page 116.

Another certificate of deposit derived from political funds was created in the Bank of Crewe in the amount of $5,300. This sum, in the form of a check drawn on the account of James Cannon, jr., chairman, in the Continental Trust Co., was forwarded to F. W. Sheffield, cashier of the Bank of Crewe, with a covering letter dated November 1, 1928, on the stationery of the headquarters committee, Anti-Smith Democrats, as follows:

"MY DEAR MR. SHEFFIELD: I am the executor of the estate of Mrs. Mary C. Moore, and some funds have come into my hands which I wish to place in your bank on time certificate of deposit. I am therefore inclosing draft for $5,300, for which please send me time certificate to James Cannon, jr., executor.

"Yours sincerely,

"JAMES CANNON, Jr."

This certificate which was dated November 2, 1928, only a few days before election, remained with the Bank of Crewe until January 14, 1929, when it was deposited with accrued interest of $42.40 in a savings account in the same bank to the credit of James Cannon, jr., executor. This was the same account in which the certificate of deposit for $8,000, derived from Jameson funds, to which reference has already been made, was deposited. The balance of this executor's account was subsequently transferred to the personal savings account of James Cannon, jr., in the Bank of Crewe.

Attention of the committee was also directed to the fact that a payment of $528 was made on a personal note of James Cannon, jr., in the First National Bank of Blackstone on September 18, 1928, out of the political funds deposited in the Continental Trust Co., of Washington, D. C. It may be noted that this account had been opened on August 6 with a letter stating that it was an account of "the committee to defeat Al Smith." It is true that Bishop Cannon made an initial deposit of $2,000 drawn on his personal account in Richmond in opening this political account, but this amount and more had already been withdrawn and redeposited in Bishop Cannon's personal account before the check for $528, above referred to, was drawn.

Some reference may also be made to the fact that a total of $17,450 was withdrawn from the political account in the Continental Trust Co. and deposited in the personal account of James Cannon, jr., in the American National Bank of Richmond. This was offset by total deposits of $6,565.55 in the political account, representing checks drawn upon the personal account of Bishop Cannon in either the American National Bank of Richmond or the Citizens Bank & Trust Co. of Blackstone.

These deposits, however, in Bishop Cannon's personal account appear to occupy a different status from the time certificates of deposit to which reference has been made. These deposits in the personal account may have been used for political purposes, whereas the time deposits remained intact for a considerable period after the end of the campaign.

The attention of the committee was also directed to the activities of Bishop Cannon and his associates in connection with the solicitation of funds to pay a deficit, which it is stated existed at the end of the campaign, although Miss Burroughs's official report of November 1, 1928, lists no unpaid bills or obligations.

On November 22, 1928, Bishop Cannon addressed a letter to William C. Gregg, of Hackensack, N. J., in which he said:

"I am doing my best to close up all the matters connected with the campaign. We got through financially, I suppose, as well as we could expect. I have carried a little advertisement in all the southern newspapers as follows:

"'Wanted: $6,500 to pay the balance still due on the campaign expenses of Anti-Smith Democrats committee.'" (Hearings, p. 267.)

Mr. Gregg replied, inclosing check for $250 to be applied on the deficit. This contribution was acknowledged by Bishop Cannon on November 28, 1928, with the statement:

"I appreciate very much your continued interest in our work in the South, and am glad to say that we have received something over $2,000 on the $6,500 deficit." (Hearings, p. 268.)

Thus by the end of November the deficit would appear to have been reduced to about $4,500.

The testimony of Mr. Jameson shows, however, that on December 6, 1928, he gave Bishop Cannon a check for $4,300 to be applied on the deficit. This, it would appear, should have substantially wiped out the remaining deficit. Nevertheless, Mr. Jameson was asked for and made a further payment of $3,000 to Bishop Cannon on January 14, 1929. As to the purpose of this payment the testimony was as follows:

"The CHAIRMAN. Then on January 14 you made a further contribution in the amount of $3,000. What was the occasion for this payment?

"Mr. JAMESON. Well, he hadn't raised much money, and he needed some to help out. At least he said he did." (Hearings, p. 244.)

However, the solicitation of funds to pay off the deficit of the Anti-Smith Democrats was continued during the month of January through the use of form letters bearing the signatures of James Cannon, jr., chairman, and J. Sidney Peters, secretary. Copies of these forms appear in the record of the committee. (Hearings, p. 245.) One of these form letters was addressed to Mr. Gregg, who replied, suggesting that he would take care of the last $500 of the deficit. To this Bishop Cannon replied under date of January 21, 1929:

"I greatly appreciate your proposition. It is the very thing that I need to use as a springboard with some other gentlemen who are greatly interested in clearing off this deficit of our committee." (Hearings, p. 268.)

This final contribution of $500 from Mr. Gregg was solicited by Bishop Cannon in a letter of February 4 and was duly paid on February 9, 1929. (Hearings, pp. 268–9.)

Rev. J. Sidney Peters, who joined with Bishop Cannon in signing the circular letters by which contributions to pay off this alleged deficit were solicited, was subpœnaed as a witness before the committee. He was asked regarding this matter, but declined to testify. (Hearings, p. 304.)

In conclusion your committee desires to submit a brief statement regarding certain phases of the investigation which the committee was required to conduct under the terms of Senate Resolution 403. In the first place, the committee wishes to make it clear that its inquiries into the bank accounts standing in the name of Bishop Cannon were made only because political funds were deposited and intermingled with other funds in those accounts. No account which appeared upon its face to be a personal account was examined into until the evidence in the possession of the committee indicated that political funds had been deposited in such account. The witnesses heard by the committee were primarily bank officials and others who testified to the facts as shown by their records. If, in the investigation and analysis of these intricate and involved transactions, any injustice has been done to any person, it has been due to the fact that witnesses who had first-hand knowledge of the facts refused to testify and withheld from the committee such documentary evidence as may have been in their possession or available to them.

After the conclusion of the hearings which the committee held with reference to this matter during the latter part of August, 1931, the United States attorney for the District of Columbia requested a transcript of the testimony and access to the exhibits filed with the committee. This evidence was placed before a grand jury of the District of Columbia, which on October 16, 1931, found a true bill of indictment against James Cannon, jr., and Ada L. Burroughs for violating and conspiring to violate the Federal corrupt practices act. This case is now pending in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

The recommendations of the committee for changes in the corrupt practices act to meet the conditions disclosed by this investigation are set forth in the final report of the committee, which is being separately submitted.

REPAYMENT OF DAMAGES TO CITIZENS OF WASHINGTON STATE

Mr. DILL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 67) to provide for the payment of damages to American citizens in the State of Washington for property destroyed by Consolidated Smelter Co., of Trail, British Columbia, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas for the past seven years poisonous fumes from the Consolidated Smelter Co., of Trail, British Columbia, Canada, have been carried in a southernly direction across the international boundary line and settled upon the growing crops, orchards, timber, and the farm lands of the citizens of the State of Washington residing along the Columbia River from the Canadian boundary line southward and beyond Marcus, Wash., and thereby blighting the crops and timber and destroying the fertility of the soil in the area upon which said smelter fumes settle; and

Whereas the citizens of the northern part of Stevens County, Wash., as aforesaid, whose crops, orchards, timber, and lands have been damaged and destroyed by the fumes of said Consolidated Smelter Co., of Trail, British Columbia, have repeatedly petitioned the President of the United States and the Secretary of State for protection from further destruction of their property by said fumes and for payment of damages because of their inability to bring suit in the courts of Canada for damages against said Consolidated Smelter Co., of Trail, British Columbia; and

Whereas after reference of said complaints to the International Joint Commission of the United States and Canada, and a complete investigation and full hearings on the claims for damages, the American members of said International Joint Commission have been unable to induce the Canadian members of said commission to agree that the said Consolidated Smelter Co. shall pay such sums of money as are necessary to provide payment for damages suffered by the citizens of the State of Washington as hereinbefore described; and

Whereas it has always been the custom and duty of the Government of the United States to protect the lives and property of its citizens whether within or without the United States against destruction or damage, or both, by foreign peoples or foreign corporations, even to the extent of using the armed forces of the United States to insure such protection in foreign lands; and

Whereas the Government of the United States has failed to protect the citizens of the State of Washington against the damage and destruction of their property within the United States, and it is the duty of the Government to secure damages through the foreign government whose nationals have damaged and destroyed the property of citizens of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the citizens of the State of Washington whose crops, orchards, timber, and lands have been destroyed by the fumes of the Consolidated Smelter Co., of Trail, British Columbia, such amount and amounts in the form of damages to the individual citizens, companies, and corporations whose claims are on file with the International Joint Commission as the American members of said International Joint Commission shall find justly due said citizens, companies, and corporations in addition to such sums as said International Joint Commission may decide to be paid to said citizens by the Consolidated Smelter Co., of Trail, British Columbia, Canada; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated such sums as may be necessary to pay said claims to an amount not exceeding $1,500,000.

FOREIGN-DEBT MORATORIUM—AMENDMENTS

Mr. DILL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period, beginning July 1, 1933, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 3, line 12, after the word "reduced," insert the words "or postponed."

Mr. HOWELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period, beginning July 1, 1933, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 3, line 15, after the period add the following:

It is hereby further declared that no further postponement of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States shall be considered by Congress unless and until the European nations indebted to the United States on account of prearmistice war loans shall have effectively assented, in a form and manner satistory to the President, to the reformation of the Versailles treaty, including the return to the German Government of its former but now mandated colonies.

PROPOSED DECREASES IN APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I offer a resolution, which I ask to have read and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 120), as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate in reporting to the Senate upon the several appropriation bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, make such decreases in proposed appropriations as will bring the total amount reported to the Senate at least $300,000,000 below the total recommended in the Budget for such fiscal year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to postpone indefinitely Senate Resolution No. 54, the same matter having been incorporated in Senate Resolution 85, which has already been passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and, without objection, the order requested by the Senator from Tennessee will be entered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF A JOINT RESOLUTION

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the Senate that on December 21, 1931, the President approved and signed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 39) extending the time within which the War Policies Commission is required to submit its final report.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 930) limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code with respect to counsel in the case of the Appalachian Electric Power Co. v. George Otis Smith et al.

SENATOR SHIPSTEAD'S ADDRESS ON THE FINANCIAL QUESTION

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, last night the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] delivered an address over a nation-wide radio hook up. The address was on the financial question. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the United States Daily, December 22, 1931]

TREASURY NOTES AS LEGAL TENDER ARE SUGGESTED—NON-INTEREST-BEARING ISSUE TO EXPAND CURRENCY IN CIRCULATION IS ADVOCATED BY SENATOR SHIPSTEAD

The issuance of necessary money in the form of non-interest-bearing Treasury notes, making them legal tender for the payment of public and private debts, was advocated by Senator HENRIK SHIPSTEAD (Farmer-Labor), of Minnesota, in a radio address December 21 over the National Broadcasting Co.'s network.

Senator SHIPSTEAD asserted that the proposed Government corporation with a capital of $500,000,000 "is in fact a Government banking corporation, throwing the credit of the Government back of these institutions and guaranteeing their assets."

SUGGESTS FINANCE PLAN

"In my opinion," he said, "a better way for expanding the currency than that proposed by this Government banking corporation would be for the Federal Government to issue necessary money in the form of non-interest-bearing Treasury notes, making them legal tender for the payment of debts, public and private, to be retired after a period of years through taxation as bonds are retired."

Senator SHIPSTEAD's address follows in full text:

In this country the solution of all governmental problems rests in the final analysis with you people. The Government of the United States was created to be your servant. There are many problems confronting your Government to-day. Time does not permit me to call your attention to more than one of them. I believe the most outstanding problem that confronts the world to-day is the question of how international, public, and private debts can be paid, business restored, and unemployment eliminated.

A solution is being sought for this problem through the extension of credit in one form or another. It is plain that this is not a solution. It has been tried for 10 years and it has proven a failure. Juggling of credits back and forth is not paying debts. It only postpones payment and leaves the problem unsolved and increases the debts.

As a result our credit system is breaking down and we have what is called a "paralysis of credit." As this condition progresses we have a growing paralysis of business, agriculture, finance, industry, and labor. This must necessarily be so, because business, finance, and industry are based upon credit, and the basis of credit is confidence. As confidence and credit disappear values disappear. As values disappear business further becomes paralyzed, revenues decrease, unemployment increases, and prices decline.

DISCUSSES GOLD DEMAND

The falling price level is, in my opinion, the greatest menace to the world to-day. The descending price level of commodities is destroying all values. The descending prices of commodities are in turn due to the increasing demand for gold. The increasing demand for gold is due to the creation of large obligations of debts payable in gold within the last 15 years. Nations on the gold standard will accept payment for debts in only one commodity, and that is gold.

As a result the value of gold is gradually increasing and consequently the value of other commodities gradually decreasing. The production of gold has not kept pace with the creation of debts. Therefore we are suffering from a lack of a means of payment. It is difficult to estimate the amount of obligations outstanding payable in gold, but the gold supply with which to pay them is infinitesimal in comparison.

The purpose of trade is to exchange goods, both internationally and within our own country. People who are neighbors can exchange their goods back and forth in the neighborhood, but if they live long distances apart there must be a medium of exchange sufficient in quantity to make settlement possible. Such a medium of exchange is called money.

CREATION OF MONEY

Money is created by law and by law made lawful for payment of all debts, public and private. There is, however, less than $5,000,000,000 of real money in the United States. Bank deposits to the amount of $60,000,000,000 or $70,000,000,000 are not lawful money. Deposits are mainly credit—evidence of debt. The medium of exchange through which payment for goods is made has been furnished to the extent of about 70 per cent by bank checks. Bank checks are not lawful money, and they are not legal tender for payment of debts. They will be accepted in payment of debts if the creditor is confident that the check is good. Our banking system is based upon credit and credit is again based on confidence.

As confidence disappears confidence in banks and bank checks disappears and to that extent the use of checks as a medium of exchange disappears.

As the medium of exchange is restricted in volume prices again fall and the depression increases in intensity. As the depression increases in force, revenues of citizens disappear, and consequently revenues of the Government disappear, making heavier taxes necessary. To restore business, employment, and revenues, public and private, we must restore a medium of exchange in sufficient quantity to make interchange of goods possible and so break the present trade blockade.

ADVOCATES MORE MONEY

Most of the nations of the world have found it necessary to do this. It is gradually dawning upon us that we must do it ourselves. Farmers can not pay their mortgages on the present price level. Farm mortgages, like all other values, are declining because of inability to make payment. An expansion of the currency is necessary to restore prices. We must put more money in circulation.

A year ago the Federal Reserve Board cut the rediscount rates, evidently hoping to be able to expand credits and so restore prices, as was done in 1924, but so far the expected results have not been accomplished. The credit system based on confidence can not be expanded on falling prices and loss of confidence.

We must, therefore, look around for other methods. One method has been suggested by men of affairs in industry, commerce, and business. That is the restoring of silver as money by the nations of the world.

MONEY SYSTEM ILLUSTRATED

Former Finance Minister Joseph Caillaux, of France, who saved the postwar financial situation in that country by his courageous action and intelligent understanding of finance, says of these conditions:

"All the money systems of the world may be represented as an upside-down pyramid of paper notes resting on a point of gold. All that is necessary is to shake that gold point just the least bit to make the whole edifice tremble. What facilities that offers for speculators! There is only one remedy. It is not that there should be any redistribution of gold, as is being childishly suggested. Gold has its own law which it obeys. What must be done is that another monetary metal should be joined to it. Platinum has been suggested. I would prefer that silver, which was stupidly demonetized, should be rehabilitated."

However, it is agreed that restoring silver as money is practical only if agreed to by the leading nations.

DISCUSSES PROPOSED PLAN

To relieve the banks, railroads, life-insurance companies of assets they can not now dispose of, the administration is now proposing in a bill to create a Government corporation with a capital of $500,000,000, to loan funds to and discount their obligations with the Federal Reserve Bank in the amount of $1,500,000,000. This will inflate the currency in circulation in that amount. The obligations and the liabilities of the corporation will be assumed by the Government. It is in fact a Government banking corporation, throwing the credit of the Government back to these institutions and guaranteeing their assets.

While this may, if properly managed, be helpful, I want to say that, in my opinion, the temporary aid to these institutions is like repairing the roof of a house and neglecting the foundation. The foundation of all of these institutions is agricultural prices. This was proven early this fall when farm prices temporarily rose and all prices rose with them. When farm prices declined all other prices declined in sympathy. To restore values we must restore farm prices. They are the foundation of all values. Farm mortgages should be made eligible as collateral for discount with the Federal reserve bank, thereby giving them their proper status in relation to other securities.

In my opinion a better way for expanding the currency than that proposed by this Government banking corporation would be for the Federal Government to issue necessary money in the form of non-interest-bearing Treasury notes, making them legal tender for the payment of debts, public and private, to be retired after a period of years through taxation as bonds are retired. This would prevent possible loss to the Government that might be sustained by having to acquire assets that can not be collected under the proposed plan now before Congress.

If the necessary amount were issued it would have an immediate effect upon commodity price levels. Business would be restored. Values and confidence would also be restored, and the institutions now in trouble would be able to resume use of their credit without the guarantee of the Government. This we have done before. Making these notes legal tender for the payment of all debts, public and private, will keep them at par as your silver certificates have remained at par for years, while their intrinsic value is now only about 25 cents on the dollar. It is the credit of the Government back of them that keeps them at par. Ten dollars of these will buy as much for you in the department stores as $10 in gold.

CITES PRICE CHANGES

But some will say, "This is increasing the supply of money, that is, cheapening money, and making it possible to pay debts in cheap money."

I reply by saying, "Your money is dishonest now because it is 50 per cent dearer than when the debts were incurred under the high price level. By deflating the circulating medium you have deflated prices. The farmer must produce two or three times more commodities now to pay his taxes and interest than when his debt was incurred. We should restore the value of money to the value it had when farmers and commerce incurred their indebtedness. When a debtor can pay a debt in money of the same value in which the debt was incurred, then he is paying the debt in honest coin.

I believe this would go far in restoring commodity price levels, values, business, revenues of private citizens and the Government, and abolish unemployment. I do not mean to say that this would solve all our problems. I hope to have the pleasure of discussing some of the others with you at some future time.

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM GIBBS M'ADOO ON DISARMAMENT

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address by Hon. William Gibbs McAdoo at Dallas, Tex., on Tuesday, December 15, on the subject of disarmament.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Dallas Morning News, Dallas, Tex.]

McADOO SAYS DISARMAMENT ALONE CAN NOT END WARS—FULL TEXT OF ADDRESS DELIVERED HERE IS PUBLISHED BELOW

Thirteen years ago the most devastating war in all history came to an end. As the curtain fell on the long drama of ruin and misery and the word of peace ran across the shattered lands the world awoke as from a hideous nightmare.

The hatred of war, as tragically demonstrated by the folly of employing military force to reach any reasonable objective, was felt deeply by the mass of humanity, and by all wise and far-seeing people, in the days and weeks that came after the armistice in 1918.

In the hearts of men there stood the vision of a new civilization. The peoples of the earth realized that the ancient structure of statecraft and diplomacy had outlived its day. For the first time within the memory of the race millions of men and women, among them the victors as well as the vanquished, turned spontaneously and with one accord to the idea of a permanent peace based not on bayonets and battleships but on the human craving for right and justice.

At last peace had conquered war and the valor and endurance of the soldiers were to be transmuted into works of utility and beauty—into noble achievements for the welfare and happiness of mankind. The war-torn nations would erase the memories of their battle years and, facing a new dawn, march together into an era of amity and concord.

PROGRESS MADE SLOWLY

During the six months that followed the armistice of 1918 there were times when this splendid dream trembled on the verge of realization. But history has repeated itself in the lesson it has brought of bitter disillusion and disappointment. Progress is a long road which mankind has been forced to travel immemorially in pain and suffering and with faltering steps. The world can not be made over in a day or in a decade. The vital element of time, as well as the infinite complexities which flow from race, language, and commercial rivalries, have their influence upon the intricate problems of disarmament, national security, and peace.

That all men are brothers is a noble and Christian thought. But human experience has demonstrated that it is, at best, nothing more than a pleasant theory. In our struggle to secure international amity and even partial disarmament we can not disregard the inherited and traditional hates and rivalries that have been molded into history and literature.

In all ages historians and philosophers have commented on the quality of human nature that leads men into an attitude of antipathy to all that is alien and foreign. "Enemy" and "stranger" are expressed by the same word in some languages. For the good of humanity it is to be hoped that these natural antagonisms are not as deeply rooted as they appear to be. They are perhaps a survival of the primitive clan spirit, and they are kept alive by a false conception of patriotism.

Every decent person loves his home and his country, but that is not a valid reason for hating other people who speak a different language and live in other lands. This intolerant chauvinism appears in literature, not only in the United States but in all countries. Its spirit gets into the school books of the children and into the current news and editorials of the day.

Under the boast of 100 per cent Americanism, thousands of voices shout at us continually that we are better than other people, that other breeds of men, meaning those who live in other countries, are inferior to us in courage, stamina, brains, and morals. And we are not alone in this attitude of intense, unreasonable, and false nationalism. It is an outstanding vice of our epoch; the whole world indulges it. The result is a universal feeling of suspicion and jealousy, mingled with fear, which keeps every nation on guard and produces the crushing armaments that tax the life blood out of the masses and continually menace the peace of the world.

OBSTACLES TO PEACE

All these conditions constitute a formidable obstacle to any effective plan for world peace. They are a range of mountains across our path. To close our eyes to them, to imagine that they do not exist, will destroy our perspective, turn our good intentions into meaningless words and our efforts into fruitless channels.

Disarmament is not impossible or impracticable. Certainly partial disarmament, and on a very large scale, is obtainable now if the statesmen of Europe have the wisdom and vision to bring it about. It might have been accomplished in 1919 if they had supported disarmament with half the ardor they displayed at the peace conference in partitioning the territory and the spoils of the vanquished.

But it may be that any definite plan for disarmament adopted at the time the peace treaty was signed would have been ineffective. The clamor for world peace, for the laying down of arms, was the reflex of the fatigue of those who had carried arms too long. The nations of the earth were less in love with peace than they were sick of war.

If you work too hard you want to rest, if you eat too much you hate the sight of food, if you fight too much you want to stop. But these conditions are temporary. A worker, when he has rested, will work again; a man who has eaten too much will be hungry again, and the fighter will fight again whenever he thinks that his home or his native land is in peril.

Amid the music and joy, the cheering crowds and the waving flags that marked that memorable armistice day of 13 years ago there lived among the people of all nations and all races the thought that in celebrating the victory of the Allies they were celebrating a peace that would endure forever. The war that was to end all wars had fired its last gun. German militarism was destroyed, therefore war was destroyed.

CAUSES OF WAR

The cardinal error in this belief is the mistaken notion that militarism is alone responsible for war. It is true that a nation which possesses a large and powerful army is likely to bring a bitter dispute to a head by striking a blow, but the army is rarely or never the cause of the dispute; it is merely an instrument of force.

The primary cause of all war in modern times is economic strain and that in turn is the result of intense financial and commercial competition. There are other contributing causes. Overpopulation is one. When a nation reaches the limit of the capacity of its soil and its industrial development and its population still continues to grow, the probability of an explosion is greatly increased. This and other incentives to war are heightened by an exaggerated sense of nationalism, as well as by a jingoistic military spirit.

To imagine that you can abolish war by reducing or abolishing armaments alone is a fundamental misconception of the problem, yet the reduction of armies and navies would be a move in the right direction, as it would relieve civilization of a grievous load of taxes and would turn some millions of men who are now unproductive into the ways of creative industry. It would be an excellent thing to accomplish; it is worth all the effort that may be given to it.

But even the reduction of navies and armies, if carried out now, on a large scale, would serve perhaps to add to the economic discontent of the world. Such a reduction would mean, at the present moment, that the ranks of the unemployed would be increased by one or two million men. The whole problem is surrounded by intensely difficult correlated questions which must, of necessity, be considered at the same time.

WILSON'S FOURTEEN POINTS

President Wilson's 14 points, which exercised such a powerful influence in bringing the World War to a close, were accepted by all the belligerents at that time and the whole world, I believe, looked upon them as a formula for the reconstruction of civilization. The fourth of these 14 points demands, in the language of President Wilson, "Adequate guaranties given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety."

Note that phrase—"consistent with domestic safety." That means, and the President intended it to mean, that armaments as aggressive war machines were to be entirely abolished; that the armaments of every country—military, air, and naval—were to become nothing more nor less than defensive weapons, reduced "to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety."

But when the statesmen of Europe got through with their work of mangling the historic 14 points, the expression "consistent with domestic safety," had disappeared and the phrase "consistent with national safety" had taken its place. It appears in this guise in the first paragraph of Article VIII of the covenant of the League of Nations.

Notwithstanding this change in President Wilson's fundamental provision that armaments should be reduced to the lowest point consistent with "domestic safety," the friends of international peace managed to get something clear and forceful into the league covenant. In this same Article VIII it is provided that the council of the league shall formulate plans for the reduction of armaments; that these plans shall become effective when adopted by the nations in the league; and that the members of the league shall "undertake to interchange full and frank information as to the scale of their armaments, their military, naval, and air programs, and the condition of such of their industries as are adaptable to warlike purposes."

In Article IX, immediately following, it is provided that a permanent commission shall be constituted to consider the question of disarmament.

In May, 1919, Prime Minister Clemenceau, in behalf of the allied and associated powers, gave the German plenipotentiaries at Versailles the following positive assurance:

"The allied and associated powers wish to make it clear that their requirements in regard to German armaments were not made solely with the object of rendering it impossible to resume her policy of military aggression. They are also the first step toward the reduction and limitation of armaments, which they seek to bring about as one of the most fruitful preventives of war, and which will be one of the first duties of the League of Nations to promote."

That the reduction of German armaments was based upon these assurances is confirmed in the following works of Part V of the Versailles treaty:

"In order to render possible the initiation of a general limitation of the armaments of all nations Germany undertakes strictly to observe the military, naval, and air clauses which follow."

OBLIGATION DISREGARDED

There can be no doubt of the obligation thus imposed upon the allied powers which ratified the Versailles treaty to initiate promptly a limitation of their respective military, naval, and air armaments, and yet, 12 years after the event, the obligations of this treaty not only remain unfulfilled but the leading nations of Europe are maintaining greater armaments and a more staggering burden of waste and taxation than that which preceded the World War.

The failure of the Allies to keep faith with Germany in the matter of disarmament is a permanent source of distrust and bitterness among the German people. Lord Robert Cecil, in a recent article on the problem of world disarmament, says:

"The assumption that Germany was perfidiously tricked by the Allies into a position of humiliating inferiority has become the commonplace of German political journalism. This has created a desire among the Germans to rearm, which is by no means confined to Herr Hitler and his extreme nationalist followers. It is a demand which is a cause of embarrassment to any German Government. * * * This emergence of truculent indignation in Germany has in turn had its consequence in the new fortification of the French and Belgian eastern frontiers and the stiffening of political opposition in those countries to any new military reductions. And so the vicious circle is all but complete."

These words of Lord Robert Cecil are full of wisdom. The basis of men's relations to each other must be faith and confidence. The Allies can not break their solemn promise to Germany and expect Germany to keep her promise to them.

The permanent commission provided for in the Versailles treaty has inspired a number of disarmament conferences. The commission, with the league behind it, has undoubtedly acted in good faith; in fact, the history of the league shows unmistakably that one of the major purposes of this fraternity has been, and is now, the promotion of disarmament and the abolition of war. Yet the authority of the league is limited, and without full cooperation of all the powers, including the United States, it can not successfully perform the duty imposed upon it by the treaty. The efforts of the league in the way of disarmament have met thus far with small success. It is true that some insignificant results have been achieved in the shape of naval limitations, but even these are of problematical value. Capital ships have been reduced in number only to have their places taken by submarines, swift cruisers, and flocks of airplanes.

ONE OFFERS TO DISARM

It is a singular fact that amid all the world-wide talk of disarmament, only one great nation has made an official proposal for complete and universal disarmament on land and sea and in the air. That nation is Russia—and Russia possesses to-day one of the largest and most effective armies in the world.

At the Geneva Disarmament Conference in 1927 Russia offered to disarm completely if the other nations would also disarm. The proposal of Litvinoff, the Russian delegate, was, to quote his words: "The general and complete disarmament of all land, sea, and air forces within a year."

The Russian proposal was voted down. It is surprising to find that the United States voted against it. At that conference our representatives acted in concert with France and the group of nations allied with France, namely, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Belgium, and Yugoslavia. This group, all armed to the teeth, was then—and has been generally—opposed to any reduction of land or air armaments.

The disarmament proposals of Russia were given a curt dismissal by the delegates at Geneva, for the reason—according to an explanation which appeared after the conference—that they were not considered sincere. It is alleged that Russia put them before the league merely to have them voted down; that she wanted to show up the capitalistic world before her own people and thus be able to put through her own military program without opposition at home.

I have never believed in the soundness of this explanation. At any rate, if I had been a delegate at that conference, I would have accepted the Russian proposals at their full value and would have indorsed any reasonable proposal that would accomplish disarmament, no matter from whom it came or whence its source.

At the same conference in Geneva in 1927 Germany urged a prohibition against the bombing of cities from airplanes. It was also defeated through the influence of France and her allies, assisted by the United States. It is difficult to understand why the United States opposed this step to mitigate the horrors of war—to protect noncombatants in cities and unfortified places.

EUROPE A MILITARY CAMP

Europe is to-day a military camp, a nest of explosives, an arsenal of guns and munitions. The tramp of armies is heard from Moscow to Lisbon, from the North Sea to the Mediterranean.

There are approximately 3,000,000 men in the regular armies of the European nations, without counting the reserves. About two-thirds of this gigantic armament belongs to the so-called "French group" of nations—France and her allies. France has an army of 522,000 men, and her population is about 40,000,000. On the same ratio, we in the United States—with a population of 120,000,000—would maintain an army of more than 1,500,000 men, or about ten times the number we now have in the military service.

Poland, a young and struggling nation, supports an army of 265,000 men. And yet Poland has been in economic distress from the day it was born. It has never successfully balanced its budget without loans, but it manages to feed and clothe nearly 300,000 men who do nothing but live in barracks and keep themselves ready to fight.

The Balkan States, ravaged by war and bitten to the marrow by poverty, belong to the French group of overarmed nations. Three small countries—Jugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Rumania—in spite of their limited resources, maintain armies that aggregate more than 400,000 men.

In the present state of international affairs there is no doubt whatever that the military policy of France has the effect of greatly increasing world tension.

Keeping these facts in mind, let us imagine ourselves a gathering of French citizens and look at the disarmament problem from their point of view. No man assumes a heavy expense without a cause; no man weighs himself down with a burden just for the fun of the thing—and that applies to nations as well as to individuals. The cause may be senseless; the reason may be faulty; and the burden may be useless; but you may be sure that the man or nation that bears the burden does not think so, else it would be quickly dropped. Every nation that is supporting a large army justifies its policy on the ground of national safety.

France remembers the gray-clad German hosts that swept over the fields of northern France within the memory of all of us; and Frenchmen, recalling the lessons of history, have not forgotten that France has been invaded again and again in modern times. France wants security; she wants safety. No disarmament conference will ever persuade the French Nation to disarm until the safety of France is assured. To accomplish that with reasonable assurance a stronger peace compact than has been proposed will be necessary. Will it be forthcoming?

WAR MORE DESTRUCTIVE

Military experts declare that 1 soldier to-day is equal in destructiveness to 10 soldiers in 1914. This increase in destructive power is due to the deadliness of modern weapons.

During the World War the maximum quantity of bombs thrown in one month from airplanes (including those of all armies) amounted to 12 tons. To-day the French Army alone possesses enough military airplanes to drop 120 tons of bombs in a single attack. Imagine 120 tons of high explosives and poison gases let loose in the sky above a defenseless city! If such an attack were made on a community the size of Dallas, in all probability not a house would be left standing nor a person left alive.

Marshal Foch made some predictions concerning the future warfare. He said:

"The next war will be a war in the fullest sense of the word, and, moreover, it can no longer be isolated.

"Poison-gas bombs will spread deadly fumes which will penetrate any mask and produce death in a few minutes. Phosphorus bombs, impossible to extinguish, will burn the flesh to the bone within 30 seconds. Hundreds of tanks, each one able to shoot a thousand deadly bullets a minute, machine guns like automatic rifles which, in the hands of a million men, will shoot 100,000,000 bullets a minute, will also be raging, and the heavens above will be darkened by a thousand airplanes pouring a rain of horror on the earth.

"Behind the lines cities and villages will crumble in ruins under the destructive fire of the largest artillery. In the next war there will be no such thing as the front and rear. The whole nation will find itself on the firing line."

When we read these impressive words of Marshal Foch and picture the scenes which he describes we must realize that the next war, if it comes, will convert the civilized world into a madhouse. It should strengthen our resolution to resist by every means in our power a recurrence of the insanity which came upon the world in 1914, and which even now appears to distort the vision and impair the judgment of the responsible statesmen of Europe and of the United States.

ECONOMIC TENSION

To abolish war effectively we must contrive some means to lessen the intense economic tension which is in the era one of the outstanding characteristics of our civilization. Every great industrial nation wants economic security and equal economic opportunity in the open markets of the world. Economic security means also physical security. With the economic security of all great nations assured, physical security will follow almost as an inevitable sequence. Without economic security domestic prosperity is impossible, but even domestic prosperity may not be possible unless economic opportunity is provided for all competitive nations in the world's open markets.

This is a highly complex question, involving considerations of territorial limits, colonial possessions, the maintenance of the "open door"—as in China, for instance—and a fair chance for all in the intensely competitive international markets. It is for these economic reasons that overpopulated European nations like Germany, France, England, and Italy have always sought to extend their colonial possessions. Such possessions give an outlet for the overcrowded population and open new avenues for their domestic commerce.

Wars over territorial boundaries and over the expansion of the national domain have occurred throughout human history; but war never decides anything upon the basis of equity or justice. Field Marshal Sir William Robertson, a professional soldier, said recently: "War hurts everybody, benefits nobody but the profiteer, and settles nothing." His words ought to be cut in stone and set up in every community on earth. Every peace treaty expresses the will of the conqueror imposed upon the vanquished; every such treaty causes new dissatisfactions and hatred, which culminate in another war when the vanquished find the opportunity to regain what was lost and to secure satisfaction for the wrongs and injustices they feel that they have suffered.

We do not have to go beyond the Versailles treaty to establish this point. Germany, for instance, bitterly resents the territorial limitations imposed upon the Central Powers and rankles because of the appropriation by the Allies of her colonial possessions. The economic security as well as the economic opportunity of this great industrial Nation has been seriously restricted. Such a policy plants the seed of future war.

It is true that huge military and naval armaments increase the economic pressure upon every people so burdened, and that any reduction of armaments, and especially their abolition, would mitigate this economic pressure. Complex as is the disarmament problem, it is simple compared with the readjustment of the international economic order among the great industrial powers in such a way as to give them the economic security and opportunity so necessary to their welfare and to the reduction or abolition of their military and naval establishments. Until the economic situation is fairly satisfied there will never be any reasonable assurance of a peaceful international order.

DISARMAMENT NOT ENOUGH

Any reduction in armaments is desirable on the ground of national economy, but if we believe that such a reduction would put an end to great and disastrous wars—unless the movement is accompanied by profound economic adjustments—we are simply deceiving ourselves.

To illustrate my point, let us suppose that some years before the World War began the great powers had entered into an agreement to abolish nine-tenths of their existing land armaments. The German Army would have dropped to 80,000 men and all other nations would have reduced in proportion. Can we reasonably believe that this alone—this situation of comparative disarmament—would have prevented the World War? When we review the causes which led to the war I think it would have had no appreciable effect. Germany's army of 80,000, in place of 800,000, would have swept into Belgium, to be met by that little kingdom's two or three regiments, and across the border France's army of 60,000 men would have been ready for the onslaught.

For a few weeks all the scenes of the World War would have been enacted on a small scale; then the recruits would have poured in. In a year millions of men would have been at the front and the history of the conflict would have been almost identical with what actually happened during the four years that followed August 1, 1914.

When the United States entered the war in 1917 our Army was so small in numbers that a member of the German general staff contemptously described it as a mere "squad." We went in with little preparation and certainly without a large body of trained soldiers, and yet within the brief period of 18 months 4,000,000 American soldiers were under arms—all of them trained and ready for battle; and behind them were incredibly large accumulations of munitions and supplies.

Armies may be quickly made, and any nation skilled in industrial mechanics and chemistry can readily produce guns, poison gases, and high explosives.

Every machine shop can be turned into a plant for making shells; every factory where machines are made—even such innocuous implements as sewing machines and typewriters—can be transformed into a munition plant. Civilian airplanes may become fighting planes and bombers. Chemical factories are able to produce poison gas in large quantities on short notice.

My purpose in presenting these facts is not to depreciate the movement toward disarmament but to state the problem in all its harshness. Any other presentation of the case would be futile and meaningless.

Germany is practically disarmed to-day. Under the Versailles treaty the German nation is allowed to have an army of only 100,000 men, no military airplanes, no submarines, and no high-powered guns. But all the resources for making these implements of war exist in Germany and must continue to exist. Besides, the personnel of the German Army is of the highest grade. Limited to 100,000 men, the army is composed of highly trained units. Virtually every man in it is capable of serving as an officer and of training other men quickly and efficiently.

The French military authorities have a clear understanding of the small German Army's high efficiency and of the readiness of German industry for adaptation to military purposes. For that reason the French strategists, in case of another war, have evolved a plan for destroying the large industrial centers of Germany by scattering bombs and gases from airplanes before the German Nation can get ready to fight.

NAVAL ASPECTS OF PROBLEM

Let us now turn to the naval aspects of the problem. Let us suppose that all the great naval powers to-day agreed to sink every battleship, ever cruiser, every submarine, and every type of naval craft, and did it. Who would have command of the sea in case another war broke out? That nation, of course, which possessed at the time the largest and swiftest merchant marine. These merchantmen could be quickly armed with guns and become as effective on the high seas as the preponderant naval fleet of any nation in existing circumstances.

What nation would have command of the air if all military and naval planes were destroyed? Again, it would be that nation which possessed the swiftest, most efficient, and largest commercial fleet of airships; they could be equipped with guns and appliances for dropping deadly explosives, just as merchant vessels could be quickly converted into armed cruisers.

The nations of Europe that were associated with the United States during the World War owe this country more than $11,000,000,000. Some of our distinguished public men, in a well-meaning effort to bring about general disarmament, have suggested that the United States cancel this debt, provided our debtors will agree to abolish their armies and navies. In short, their proposal is to purchase disarmament and world peace.

It is a generous gesture, but would it be effective? In my opinion, it is a hopelessly futile proposal. First, because no nation would jeopardize its national safety—or anything that it considers necessary to safety—to liquidate a foreign debt that it does not have to pay, anyway, if it wants to dishonor itself by repudiating its obligations. In the second place, why should we attempt to buy the disarmament of Europe by canceling debts amounting to $11,000,000,000 which are justly due us, and which must in the end be liquidated by taxing the American people if our debtors are released from their obligations? If the nations of Europe can not get together and settle this problem without calling on the United States for $11,000,000,000, then European statesmanship must be at a low ebb.

In the third place, what guarantee could be given that the disarmament plan so purchased would be carried out and observed by future governments or future generations?

FUTILITY OF PURCHASE

Let us assume, for the purpose of discussion, that such a purchase of disarmament could be effected. In that case it could only apply to military, naval, and air armaments and could not reach or limit the human ingenuity which might, within a short time thereafter, devise new and secret methods of warfare which could not be successfully covered by the purchase agreement.

By what possible or conceivable means could the secret processes of the laboratories of each nation be so controlled that an end could be put to the development of those deadly chemicals and substances which will undoubtedly determine the issues of the next war? Who knows the secrets, which each nation to-day is carefully guarding, of the chemical researches, discoveries, and preparations already made for the next conflict? It is impossible to reach these things by treaty or by any sort of bargain or purchase.

Disarmament will be accomplished satisfactorily when, and only when, some new formula is found that will give both economic and physical security to all nations—big and little. Then and only then will the people of the overarmed nations realize the colossal folly and waste of maintaining armaments that add to their burden of poverty.

Some spokesmen in Europe claim that the weight of the $11,000,000,000 debt which European nations owe to the United States is too heavy for them to carry. I think that I may claim, with reason, that the American people are the most generous people on earth. We are the only nation among the victors in the World War which waived all indemnities, either of land or money. We asked for nothing and got nothing. Besides, we have since the war reduced the obligations of our debtors and have given them 60 years in which to discharge them. Their annual payments to us for interest and amortization are not onerous.

When you take into account the fact that the nations of Europe are expending $4,500,000,000 annually on armaments and that at least $3,000,000,000 of this amount is spent every year by our debtors, it is obvious that if each of the nations that owes us should reduce its expenditure for armaments one-half, it could, with ease, continue to pay us on the 60-year plan—in 60 installments—and use the money saved from armaments to improve its own economic condition.

WAR IS COSTLY

Everybody knows that war is disastrous and costly, and everybody knows that its way is marked by blood and tears; everybody knows that it leads to national poverty; everybody knows that it is wicked and has no place in a Christian civilization, but this knowledge and the moral conviction that it implies have had small effect in preventing war or even in promoting disarmament.

The world is full of sore spots, and every sore spot is likely to spread its infection and become a breeding place for future wars.

Russia is a sore spot. For all practical purposes Soviet Russia is looked upon as an outlaw in the community of nations. Why? Because the Russian people have established a system of society—and of government—which does not agree with the ideas current in the rest of the world. We do not like communism, and most of the peoples of the earth, outside of Russia, agree with us. Therefore the United States, in common with other powers, declines to hold diplomatic intercourse with the Russian Government.

Permit me to say that our attitude is in direct contradiction of our historic principles. We have always held that the people of any country have an unalienable right of self-determination. It was on that very point that we made our fight for independence. It is asserted in our Declaration of Independence that "it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it (government) and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

I do not believe in communism myself, but if the people of Russia want a communistic government why should we treat them as pariahs and outcasts and refuse them recognition when they have done exactly what our Declaration of Independence asserts that every people has a right to do—establish a government on "such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

MUST CONSIDER RUSSIA

Russia is, of course, armed from head to foot. Can you blame her? If you call a man an outlaw and stand around his house making threatening gestures, should it be a matter of surprise if he appears at the door with a shotgun in his hand?

No effective plan of disarmament can be made unless Russia is taken into the family of nations and becomes a party to it.

Civilization can not go forward much further until we get rid of the sore spots.

Against the background of modern culture and philosophy war stands as a disease of civilization.

The first thing to do in a disease is to ascertain its causes, to make an accurate diagnosis. Then, with the facts in hand, we may proceed intelligently to devise a remedy. We can not cure a cancer by subscribing to a formal resolution that cancers shall be outlawed; that they shall not exist; and we can not abolish war by resolutions, or even by treaties, declaring that war shall be outlawed; that it shall not occur.

The chief cause of modern wars—but not the only cause—is economic pressure, and this is brought about in turn by complicated social forces.

The tone and temper of our civilization emanate from a highly developed individualism. That is the keynote. Every man looks out for himself first of all. Then he stands for his own community and for his Province or State, and then again he is for his own country, as opposed to the rest of the world. These are natural impulses; they belong to the inherent qualities of life. But when they are accentuated and sharpened to a keen edge—as they are to-day throughout the world—they become as dangerous as dynamite. They bring out and develop all the combative elements in the human spirit.

The individualistic civilization worked well for a long time. It worked well enough while the modern world was new, while there were new countries to exploit, and while the consuming demand for commodities continued to open up great vistas of commercial opportunity.

INDIVIDUALISM PASSING

The age of individualism is now drawing to a close, because the field for exploitation is growing smaller and smaller. This situation has been enormously emphasized by the fact that there is no curb on production, no effective regulation of commercial activity, no restriction which sets a limit on money-making. These conditions prevail in every community and in every country.

When a business concern is pressed by the necessity of enlarging its market to keep its plant going and pay wages and profits it attempts to undersell its competitors, to push them off the map, so to speak. The same tendency inspires the policy of nations; and as we behold the world at this moment we see it composed of national groups engaged in bitter commercial rivalry. Governments are furthering the efforts of their nationals, and necessarily so, because the people in these overpopulated European States can not exist upon themselves alone; they must have outlets. This competition in the economic field, with its incidental corollary of territorial acquisitions and expansion, is a fruitful source of war.

These rivalries encourage national hatreds, and the two things combined operate to cause burdensome armaments through the use of which, when needed, each nation hopes not alone to maintain existing advantages and to acquire others, but to weaken, if not to destroy, any effective competition by its neighbors.

The intense political and military nationalism that stares at us from the dispatches in every newspaper is accompanied by the economic nationalism that I have tried to depict. Every nation in continental Europe sits behind a tariff wall which prevents the free movement of commerce. They are all following the example of the United States, under the impression that the great wealth of this country has been created by our prodigiously high tariff. Our tariff has made us an economic enemy of the whole world. At the present time not less than 47 countries have set up special tariff restrictions that apply to American imports in retaliation against our own commercial barriers.

ECONOMIC WAR

The forerunner of every military war is a long-continued and silent economic war. The best way and the surest way to end wars is to build up, gradually and by degrees, a genuine economic international order that will afford every nation economic security and a fair opportunity for economic expansion.

Much good might be accomplished by an international conference on the economic conditions of the world. The first conference would lead to others and might eventuate in the establishment of a permanent council on economic affairs.

As I see the problem of disarmament, it has three distinct branches:

First, direct and complete disarmament, or, in the event that can not be achieved, a reduction, and the largest possible reduction, in the size of army and navy and air forces. This might be effected by treaties or agreements, provided that some formula for national security can be devised.

Second, a consideration of economic and other factors that lead to wars, with a determined purpose to rectify them. A strong and sustained effort to do this would be beneficial, even if it failed to solve the entire problem.

Third, a campaign of education to abate the intense nationalism that prevails throughout the world, and to build up, in its place, a genuine spirit of international friendship.

In the course of this address I have discussed some of the causes that lead to war. There is one cause that I have not yet mentioned—and that is the fighting spirit of the human race. Man is a fighter by nature, by instinct. Civilization has come out of the dark jungle of savagery by virtue of its fighting spirit. In the course of history men have fought each other, they have fought nature, they have fought savages, they have fought disease, they have fought poverty. As fighters they have widened the horizon of human consciousness and human energy.

We can not abolish the fighter; to get rid of him would be to set us back immeasurably in the scale of progress. But we may sublimate his energies. I get this term of sublimation from the psychoanalysts. They have proved that the destructive instincts may be transformed into dynamic forces of benefit to the world; that evil may be turned into good and ugliness into beauty.

Human nature has a wide range. At one end of the fighting scale are those who combat disease and poverty, at the other end is the murderer who kills his fellow men.

TURN FIGHTER TO OTHER TASKS

To abolish war we must sublimate the war impulse, we must still keep the fighter, but we must give him an objective that has nothing to do with destruction. We must make the soldier a constructive force; we must turn his fine heroism and his energies into something that benefits humanity.

Let us fight the obstacles of nature. Let us fight poverty and disease. The building of the Panama Canal was not only a great achievement but it was also one of the greatest battles in all history. It was a battle against torrid heat and swamps and against a mountain that kept on sliding down. Its strategy and its end were constructive.

Let us do other things like the Panama Canal. Let us employ the talent and the courage of the soldier to make the world a finer and better place to live in.

The Russians are doing it. They have made constructive achievement take the place of war. Every Russian to-day is enlisted in an army of progress. The 1,200-mile railroad that reaches far down into Turkestan was built by what is known in Russia as "shock troops," and that means workers who lived in the spirit and temper of men in the trenches. To-day these so-called shock brigades of workers are rebuilding Russia. For example, it is decided to rebuild some filthy, antiquated village. As a first step the entire population is moved out and sheltered temporarily elsewhere. Then the army of skilled workers advances with the precision of a military force. They bring with them all the material for setting up a new village. In a short time, like a miracle, almost, a new village stands in the place of the old one—and the new houses are sanitary, roomy, well lighted, and comfortably heated.

WORLD CONFERENCE CALLED

A world disarmament conference has been called by the League of Nations, to meet in February, 1932. This conference will be the most important of all the conferences that have been held on this subject. It should lead to important and decisive results. Meanwhile the people of all the nations concerned should be aroused to the imperative necessity of compelling their respective leaders—and they will not be deaf to public opinion if it is expressed loudly and unequivocally—to get results, not in the form of empty resolutions but in the form of international agreements for a drastic reduction in the burden of armaments.

For several years a permanent commission of the league has been engaged in the study of the question from a strictly military and naval point of view, and this commission is prepared to present, as I understand it, a well-conceived scheme for the reduction of military, naval, and air forces. All members of the league will be represented, and Russia and the United States have been invited.

Let us hope that our country will assume the dignified rôle of an actual participant, and not that of a weakling observer in this conference, and use its influence to secure practical results.

Let this be followed by a similar conference on economic affairs. It would mark the beginning of a new epoch in international relations. At such a conference the important issues that underlie the structure of world commerce might be discussed freely and openly.

We could get the expression of the representatives of all nations on such questions as a possible world currency; upon the establishment of some satisfactory ratio between silver and gold, so that silver may again play its proper and useful part in world commerce; upon the advantages and disadvantages of tariff systems, and upon the regulation of industries and the competition of nations for world trade.

These problems, economic and military, deeply concern the future of civilization and the welfare of mankind throughout the world.

FOREIGN-DEBT MORATORIUM

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, when we adjourned last evening I was endeavoring to demonstrate that the original proposal made by the President on the 20th day of June last was a very different thing from that which ultimately was put in operation by him, and that the assent or acquiescence given by Members of the Congress to the proposal originally made by the President was an assent and an acquiescence to a very different thing from that which ultimately was agreed upon and finally put in operation. I demonstrated that fact by the agreement, substantially a treaty, which was initialed by the Government of the United States and the Government of France on the 6th day of July last. That particular agreement, constituting as it did a treaty between the United States and France, if treaties can be made that way, was for a proposal and for a moratorium very different in character from the proposal and moratorium which were suggested originally on the 20th of June by the President of the United States.

Not only was that so, and the documents bear me out in that regard, but in addition to that the nations interested in the proposal themselves met in London on the 11th day of August, 1931, and they entered into a treaty, a treaty in relation to the President's proposal and in relation to a moratorium to Germany.

Now, mark you the dates, because we know that haste was so essential. Mark you the dates, because we understand there was a crisis that had to be met in an extrajudicial and an extralegal and an extraordinary fashion by the President of the United States, and which did not permit the Congress, the poor miserable Congress that only represents the people of the United States, from being called in special session in order to deal with a crisis in our affairs and in the affairs of all the world.

On June 20 the proposal, and then came the happy and blithe acquiescence by 68 Senators and 276 Representatives. How often has it been asserted in the press and shaken in our face by Mr. Mills and others that 68 Senators and 276 Representatives immediately agreed to the moratorium of June 20!

Then comes July 6, when France for 16 days, standing like a lion in the path of the moratorium says, "You can not have it and it will not be adopted by France unless France is made a preferred creditor to the amount of $125,000,000."

Then came on that day, July 6, an agreement, a treaty, made between France and the United States of America. O ye here who are jealous of your prerogatives as Senators—I will amend that and say, if there are any here who are jealous of their prerogatives as Senators—think of the Constitution of the United States; think of the orderly processes of the institutions of America, and recall with me that agreement made on the 6th day of July, 1931, when Congress could not act, when Congress could not be called, when Congress could not do what was essential for the American people in a world crisis, and the executive branch of the Government alone did the job, and did it not as the President proposed but as France insisted it should be done.

Oh, the Constitution is a glorious thing, Mr. President; it is the bulwark of our liberties; it is the ark of the covenant so far as America is concerned, but I am afraid that it possesses all its virtues in one amendment alone, concerning which I hear so much from constitutional expounders and others who prate about the founders and what they gave to us in this marvelous document. Constitutional expounders in this body ought to resent what has transpired so far as this moratorium is concerned. I am perfectly certain before this debate shall have been concluded that gentlemen far greater than I am, who always expound the Constitution, who stand always as adamant for the Constitution, and who never permit under any circumstances any usurpation under it—I am perfectly certain that those expounders of the Constitution in the United States Senate will stand here in their majesty and their might and resent the fact that the Constitution of the United States was so literally flayed and frayed as to become, when it was utilized in behalf of foreign nations to put a burden of taxation upon the American people, a mere scrap of paper, torn into a thousand bits and scattered to the four winds of heaven upon this moratorium.

Not only did the United States on July 6 enter into the agreement with France but, to repeat, on the 11th day of August the nations interested entered into their agreement. I read, sir, from Miscellaneous No. 19 (1931), Report of International Committee of Experts, Respecting Suspension of Certain Intergovernmental Debts, * * * Protocols, and Declarations * * * Presented by the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to Parliament by Command of His Majesty.

It is rather an extraordinary thing, perhaps, for a Senator of the United States to go to the proceedings in Parliament and the official documents of the English Government to demonstrate what affects our people; but, Mr. President, sometimes it becomes essential, in order to get at the facts, to resort to the official publications of other governments, and only from them can we sometimes learn what has been done in respect to our own.

Here is the protocol concerning Germany. It is dated August 11, mind you. We had June 20 and July 6. Congress could not be called in session because of the world crisis and the necessity for haste. Now we have August 11, when finally the agreement was made by the other nations that were interested in the moratorium. From June 20, therefore, to August 11 is a period of only 52 days. There was not time during that period, of course, to ask the Congress to come together and to act upon the crisis; there was not then, of course, opportunity to inform the American people; but other governments acted in the fashion I have described and on the dates mentioned. Here is the protocol of the agreement of August 11:

Whereas on the 20th June, 1931, the President of the United States of America made proposals for the suspension of intergovernmental debts falling due during the year 1st July, 1931, to 30th June, 1932;

And whereas the governments' signatories of the present protocol have accepted the said proposals and have agreed to apply them in particular to the obligations of the German Government under the agreement signed at The Hague on the 20th January, 1930;

And whereas the French Government and the Government of the United States of America concluded an arrangement on the subject at Paris on the 6th July, 1931;

And whereas it is accordingly necessary to provide for the application of the new plan in the conditions thus created;

And in view of the report, dated the 11th August, 1931, drawn up by the experts who met in London for this purpose:

The undersigned, duly authorized to that effect, have agreed as follows—

Then comes article 2:

The payment of the unconditional part of the annuity from the 1st July, 1931, to the 30th June, 1932, and of the reparation tax due by the German Railway Co. from the 1st August, 1931, to the 1st July, 1932, will be governed by the provisions of annex 1 to the present protocol.

And in the annex 1 they provide, as we have learned, for the particular allocation of those unconditional payments.

There was no mistake among the governments which signed this document, and which were Belgium, Great Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, the French Republic, the Helenic Republic, Italy, Japan, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, and——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is the protocol that was agreed upon, and, as I understand the Senator's reading of it, it refers to the payment of reparations?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And this question is now before the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to read just a line from the President's message.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield for that purpose?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The President in his message says:

We are not involved in the discussion of strictly European problems, of which the payment of German reparations is one.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, Mr. President, in addition to the protocol that thus was entered into, the Governments of Belgium, Great Britain, Italy, and Japan addressed a communication or made a declaration respecting the protocol concerning Germany.

This is the declaration of these countries:

On the occasion of the signature of the protocol—

May I say that this declaration was made on the 11th of August, 1931—

On the occasion of the signature of the protocol for the application of the proposal of President Hoover to the German reparation annuities—

"For the application of the proposal of President Hoover to German reparation annuities"— the following declarations have been made—

You see, Mr. President, there was no mistake about what was intended by the original proposal of the President of the United States—

The undersigned, on behalf, respectively, of the Governments of Belgium, Great Britain, and Northern Ireland, Italy, and Japan make the following declaration:

As regards the principles of the application of President Hoover's proposal, the Governments of Belgium, Great Britain, and Northern Ireland, Italy, and Japan would much have preferred the simple system of postponing all payments for one year throughout the period of the new plan.

That is exactly what it was asserted was said by the President of the United States on June 20; that is exactly what he proposed; that is exactly what some Members of the Senate and House agreed to in their telegrams when they legislated on this important subject in that fashion; that is exactly what these other countries involved believed had been asserted by the United States of America.

But—

Proceeds the communication—

in order to achieve unanimity, the aforesaid governments are willing to accept the proposals embodied in the Franco-American agreement.

They are willing to accept the proposals involved in the agreement signed July 6, 1931, which are not the proposals made by President Hoover on June 20, 1930. Although they would have preferred to accept the original proposals, they accept the new proposals and the new plan, as they describe it in their protocol. As we proceed very briefly with the argument upon this subject, Senators will see the importance to us from every standpoint of fair dealing, frankness, and candor about this new plan thus presented by France and the United States.

In order to achieve unanimity, the aforesaid governments are willing to accept the proposals embodied in the Franco-American agreement. These proposals have, however, the effect of imposing a substantial additional burden on Germany during the year 1933 onwards, which may have the effect of prejudicing the position of these governments.

Oh, we agreed about how necessary it was for us to do something for Germany—not something that we were bound to do, not the release, not the forgiveness of a debt that Germany owed us, but it was necessary for us to do something for Germany by forgiving our debtors other than Germany. I omit the discussion of the small sum that may be due us from Germany on account of our army of occupation there, because that is of little or no consequence.

We had no obligations of the sort against Germany herself. We had obligations against Great Britain, France, Italy, and other nations. I can not impress that too strongly upon you, because we were seeking from our debtors, by forgiving them, some sort of relief for some other country. They were not seeking to grant any relief themselves; but we were taking the initiative by forgiving the debts that were due to us for the year of Great Britain, France, and Italy and postponing them to a future maturity.

These proposals—

I repeat, says this declaration from these governments—have, however, the effect of imposing a substantial additional burden on Germany during the years 1933 onward which may have the effect of prejudicing the position of these governments. In the application of these arrangements, therefore, they must naturally reserve entirely their rights and interests under existing agreements. These agreements provide that within the framework of the new plan—

Nobody thought it was the old proposal. No government on earth, no one sentient being concerned with the matter save our Congressmen and our Senators, imagined that they were dealing with the original proposal; but they were dealing, these governments and everybody else connected with the matter, with a new plan and a new idea.

These agreements provide that within the framework of the new plan the various creditor governments shall not be prejudiced by the special allocation to France out of the unconditional annuity, and it is essential that the arrangements now proposed should not have the effect of invalidating that principle.

These governments understood just what was being done, that we were making on the 6th day of July and the 11th day of August a new plan, and they were insisting that the special allocation to France should not prejudice them under the old existing order; and they say in their declaration that they would be glad to have an assurance that the French Government had no intention of the kind.

As regards the suspension of the unconditional annuities, the Governments of Belgium, Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Italy, and Japan do not consider that any special procedure was required. They point out that the proposal of President Hoover applied to all intergovernmental debts, whatever their character.

That is the proposal that you subscribed to. That is the proposal concerning which you legislated by telegram. That is the proposal that was given to the world, and that is the proposal that it is pretended now is carried by this joint resolution. These governments officially thus state, and they say in so many words:

They point out that the proposal of President Hoover applied to all intergovernmental debts, whatever their character. In their view it is always open to a creditor government to suspend the payment of any debt due to it, and such suspension in no way derogates from the stipulations governing the debt in question. Nevertheless, in view of the Franco-American agreement, they are prepared to agree that the Bank for International Settlements should obtain German Railway bonds in respect of the whole amount of the unconditional annuity, and they will raise no objection in present circumstances to the distribution of these bonds between the creditor governments in proportion to their respective shares in the unconditional annuity on the understanding that all the postponed German payments shall be repaid in all circumstances on precisely the same basis.

Then the Government of Belgium, the Government of Great Britain, the Government of Italy, the Government of Japan are the signatories; and on the 11th of August, 1931, France, having received exactly what she desired, having won her point, wrote that in view of the circumstances and the existing agreements, including the new agreement, she did not intend to do otherwise than those agreements provided for.

Thus we have the 11th of August passing with the governments of the world that were interested in the moratorium expressing what it was, knowing what it was. The only people, apparently, who did not understand what it was were our own people; and we labored under the delusion for a considerable period of time that we were carrying out the original purpose as expressed in the statement of the President on June 20, 1931.

I was quite interested in reading in the House debates the remarks of a very distinguished and a very able gentleman, for whom I have the very highest respect. I realized then that perhaps there was a confusion abroad, even in the Congress of the United States, as to what we were doing; and I read his remarks because, while I believe that he understood the situation thoroughly, they leave doubtful and ambiguous just exactly what is done by the joint resolution in question here.

Reparations—

Said he—

are used in the resolution to say to France, to England, to Belgium, and to all of those countries, that if they do not grant their debtor, Germany, a moratorium for a year on every kind of debt they have against Germany of a public character—

"On every kind of debt they have against Germany of a public character"— including their claims for reparations, we will not grant them a moratorium on the amounts they owe us. America would have been foolish to grant France and England a moratorium of what they owe America and then permit Great Britain and France to collect the reparations due them by Germany. That is the only reason reparations are in the resolution, describing the character of the debts on which other countries must grant moratoria in order to secure the benefit of our moratorium.

Thus I find, in talking to various people in respect to this matter, that some of them labor under the delusion that we are forgiving a debt that Germany owes us. Some of them have the illusion that this joint resolution applies to every debt that Germany owes to every other nation. Keep in mind, therefore, that Germany owes us nothing save the small amount I have indicated, that is of no consequence in this debate. Keep in mind that the other countries have done just exactly as the most concerned of those other countries wished to do, and that France, after her long contest, won exactly what she desired to win. She maintained the integrity, as she believed, of the Young plan; and she received, in the fashion that the agreement between the United States and her provided, the unconditional reparations.

Now let us turn to the President's message of December 10, 1931; and in order that there may be no question as to my quotations from it I should be glad if the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] would follow me while I recur to this message and comment upon it. I should be very glad if he would follow me, because I want with meticulous care to deal with this message and to leave with you then the thought whether or not that message is one that should commend itself to the Senate of the United States or to the Congress. I leave it with you then to determine, when finally we have concluded with it.

He starts with the World War debt postponement:

With the support of a large majority of the individual Members—

I resent it every time I read it.

With the support of a large majority of the individual Members of the Senate and House, I informed the governments concerned last June that—

I resent it because it is a mode of legislation that will return to plague you in the future. To-day you may believe that you have in the White House the greatest man who ever sat there. You may believe that he possesses within his own physique all the virtues that God can give to any human being, and that his head makes him a superman among those upon this earth. I do not question it here, and I am not prepared here to discuss that question at all. You here who respond to him may have an opinion of him with which I will not for the moment disagree; and you may assume that when he speaks he speaks from on high, and that his words come down from Sinai to us, and that they must be at all hazards obeyed. You may grant to him every one of those traditional characteristics that we have loved to give to Presidents of the United States, and you may imbue him with a godlike power to deal with the destinies of the American people.

I do not care whether that be your view, or your view be the reverse. When any man sits in the Executive Office in this Government as President, and when he seeks to legislate without the formalities required by the Constitution, when he deals with what means the very lifeblood of the people of this Nation, when he seeks to put upon them the burden of taxation that is not theirs in order to relieve Europe, when he deals with a subject that belongs to the Congress of the United States, if he deals with it otherwise than as the Constitution directs, if he violates the spirit of American institutions, and you tolerate it, you have taken the first step that these international bankers wish us to take. You have taken the step toward dictatorship; and in days to come that step will rise to plague you and those who follow you.

This is the first false step. This is the entering idea by which an executive official may legislate as he sees fit and in defiance of the Constitution and the institutions of America. This is the first time in the history of my life, in this body or elsewhere, when any man sitting in Executive Office has arrogated to himself the power, by a Western Union telegraph blank, to take from the people of this country $250,000,000 and saddle them with a deficit to that extent and make them pay it in unheard-of taxes.

It is because of that, really, more than because this whole thing I believe to be wrong, that I raise my voice to-day in opposition.

It does not matter that the voice of the people does not carry to the sacred precincts of the White House, where you gentlemen meet and you gentlemen decree our fate. It does not matter that that voice can go no further than this Chamber. Nevertheless, there rests upon the men who sit here an obligation, an obligation under their oaths, to stand and protest whenever their constitutional power is usurped or whenever the laws of this land shall be trampled under foot either by one man or another, or any set of men, or with the consent of any set of men, no matter who they may be. So it is that to-day I am protesting in my feeble way against this particular usurpation of power.

To-day it is my turn, my friends, to feel it. You do not, because you have consented to it in writing. That is your right. I do not criticize you by my repetition of what has been done and do not intend it in that fashion. To-day I feel it because of the intensity of a temperament which brooks no opposition when it believes the power of this Nation has been subverted, and subverted without the right of law.

I to-day feel it. You do not. Let the precedent be established; let yourselves vote this moratorium upon the facts which have been presented during this discussion, and you have established a precedent in this land, and none can tell where it will lead. The only thing that saves this country to-day from all of the turmoil which exists in some of the other nations is the fact that those who live in our bucolic territory have an inborn and instinctive love for law and order; and no matter what transpires, no matter what burdens may be put upon their backs, still they believe in law and order, and they never will initiate change or revolution.

We are different in that regard from the people in other lands, if we may believe the historical statements of what has transpired in other countries. But once let these heavily burdened farmers of ours feel the pinch as those in the great cities feel it, once let enter their souls the iron that has entered the souls of many in the great cities of the land, once let these men of the soil unite against what they may think is their betrayal, once let them unite with the spirit which you know is rife in the great cities in this land, and no man can foretell what may transpire.

To-day I would stop it at its very threshold in the usurpation of law and the violation of the Constitution. To-day I would make plain that whatever there may be in this land, whatever may transpire, there is one body, at least, legislative in character, representative of the people, which will ever stand for that which is right and that which is law.

It is because here we face the first great violation that has been attempted by an Executive that I inveigh against what has been done; and you, with your knowledge of what has transpired in the past, with your prescience as to what may happen in the future, should unite with me in preventing it.

It does not make any difference whether your views are of one sort or are of another sort upon the moratorium. Here is a fundamental question involved, a fundamental question concerning our institutions and concerning our Constitution; and upon that fundamental question there should not be either debate or difference among men who stand upon their own feet and will go their own way, fight their own battles and the battles of those who sent them here.

Mr. President, I am returning now to the message of the President, and I am glad the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has it in his hand, so that we may read it together:

With the support of a large majority of the individual Members of the Senate and House—

Just think of it, a large majority of the individual Members of the Senate and the House!

I informed the governments concerned last June that—

"The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, both principal and interest."

I am reading now the President's words, transmitted to this Congress December 10, 1931. What is it that he says?

The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, both principal and interest.

Then he proceeds:

Subject to confirmation by Congress, the American Government will postpone all payments upon the debts of foreign governments to the American Government payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1 next, conditional on a like postponement for one year of all payments of intergovernmental debts owing the important creditor powers.

In making this proposal, he publicly stated the purposes, and he proceeded then with the purposes stated. Then subsequently he uses these words, which appear on the second page of the message:

I wish to take this occasion also to frankly state my views upon our relations to German reparations and the debts owed to us by the allied governments of Europe. Our Government has not been a party to, or exerted any voice in determination of, reparation obligations. We purposely did not participate in either general reparations or the division of colonies or property. The repayment of debts due to us from the Allies for the advance for war and reconstruction were settled upon a basis not contingent upon German reparations or related thereto. Therefore, reparations is necessarily wholly a European problem with which we have no relation.

But in the first sentence he uses he says:

The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts.

So it does not make any difference what flexibility there may be in language, what high-sounding words may be used, we do connect, and inextricably connect, the reparations and the war debts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Granting that the President did an extraordinary thing, perhaps an illegal thing, in failing to convene Congress——

Mr. JOHNSON. I will answer any question the Senator may ask.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would like to inquire of the Senator whether he thinks the President exaggerated or misrepresented as to the actual conditions in the world.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think he was utterly in error as to what was absolutely essential to be done. I have no doubt upon that point, and I want to call this to the attention of Senators: We forgave $250,000,000 to France, Great Britain, and Italy. Doctor Melchoir testified before the commission in Switzerland that Germany had paid substantially $250,000,000 in short-time credits in the past six months. There is the relationship, and it does not require a man with a microscopic eye or a Senator with a brain as acute as that of some of those who are here before me or some of those who are not to understand that. You can understand just exactly the relationship that thus existed.

I follow now with another paragraph from the President's message:

I do not approve in any remote sense of the cancellation of the debts to us.

I leave comment upon that for a subsequent moment.

I do not approve in any remote sense of the cancellation of the debts to us. World confidence would not be enhanced by such action. None of our debtor nations have ever suggested it. But as the basis of the settlement of these debts was the capacity under normal conditions of the debtor to pay, we should be consistent with our own policies and principles if we take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world. I am sure the American people have no desire to attempt to extract any sum beyond the capacity of any debtor to pay, and it is our view that broad vision requires that our Government should recognize the situation as it exists.

This course of action is entirely consistent with the policy which we have hitherto pursued. We are not involved in the discussion of strictly European problems, of which the payment of German reparations is one. It represents our willingness to make a contribution to the early restoration of world prosperity in which our own people have so deep an interest.

I wish further to add that while this action has no bearing on the conference for limitation of land armaments to be held next February, inasmuch as the burden of competitive armaments has contributed to bring about this depression, we trust that by this evidence of our desire to assist we shall have contributed to the good will which is so necessary in the solution of this major question.

That is the end of the quotation, and I congratulate the President, and I am delighted to be able to congratulate the President—I call the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to this, if the Senator from Utah will give me his attention. I congratulate the President, and I am very glad to be able to congratulate the President on what I now read. I wish, sir, always when he does an act which is of the sort that I believe ought to be performed to give him his full meed of credit. Immediately after that portion which is in quotation, which I have just read, the President said, of course, in his message to the Congress of the United States these words, and I congratulate him upon them:

Since the statement of the 20th of June was made, which I have just quoted, the proposal of the American Government had to be altered because France would not agree to it. France insisted that the unconditional reparations, which, of course, were included in my original proposal, should be paid by Germany, and the most that could be obtained from France was that upon the payment of these unconditional reparations, amounting substantially to $125,000,000, this sum should be reloaned to Germany upon bonds which should be underwritten by the German Government, and which would be reloaned to the German railways. Reluctantly I was compelled, therefore, to transmute the proposal originally made for the postponement of payments on all intergovernmental debts into postponement, so far as reparation payments by Germany were concerned, to conditional reparations only, and to exclude from the operation of the moratorium the unconditional reparations due to France.

Of course, under the circumstances, the 276 Members of the House who acquiesced in the original proposal, and the 68 Members of the Senate who did likewise, are at full liberty to exercise their individual judgments upon the altered and different proposal which finally was agreed to by me with France on the 6th day of July, and accepted by the other nations concerned on the 11th day of August.

That is a statement which I think the Senator from Utah will agree with me was a candid and a frank and a fair statement to be made. I ask him if he does not.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly do as to the amount which was loaned to the railroads; and not only that, but with the situation as it existed at that time the President could not have made any other statement, as the amount of money was loaned to the German railroads, and certainly had to be taken into consideration, and it was, in the settlement, and the money remained in Germany.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I congratulate the Senator from Utah upon agreeing with me upon the fact that this was a frank and a fair and an open statement made by the President of the United States to the Congress, and, of course, being that kind of a statement, it ought to have been made. But the difficulty is that while the Senator from Utah agrees that that was a frank statement for the President to make, and while we all agree that he ought to have made it, he did not make it at all. I interpolated in this message, merely for the purpose of illustration, the facts in order that I might have the agreement of the Senator from Utah, who is always, fair, open, frank, candid, and aboveboard—that I might have his indorsement when I read this interpolation into the message.

So, Mr. President, we have a message here that should have shown the facts and that did not show the facts. Would it not have been better, sir, would it not have been something which we would all have appreciated more—the Senator from Utah and I assuredly would have appreciated it more, I know, from the admission that he has made—instead of leaving the message where it stopped, without a word concerning what was done with France or what the the other nations of the earth did with this moratorium—would it not have been more in consonance with fairness and with frankness and with what transpired, for the President to have given us the details, as has been asserted ought to have been given by the Senator from Utah and myself?

Mr. President, this message I continue to read because I wish to show just exactly what its implications were:

All the important creditor governments accepted this proposal.

Not the proposal of France, not the proposal that we just read as a part of the message by way of illustration. They accepted "the proposal," says the President.

All the important creditor governments accepted the proposal.

This is the proposal, the proposal of June 20, 1931.

The necessary agreements among them have been executed, and creditor governments have foregone the receipt of payments due them since July 1, 1931.

I read, in justice to the President, the remainder of the message:

The effect of this agreement was instantaneous in reversing the drift toward general economic panic and has served to give time to the peoples of those countries to readjust their economic life. The action taken was necessary. I am confident it commends itself to the judgment of the American people.

Payments due to the United States Government from many countries, both on account of principal and interest, fall due on December 15. It is highly desirable that a law should be enacted before that date authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to postpone all payments due us on account of debts owed by foreign governments to the United States Government during the year ending June 30, 1932, and to provide for their payment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933.

As we approach the new year—

Here is a message of a different nature and a different kind:

As we approach the new year it is clear that a number of the governments indebted to us will be unable to meet further payments to us in full pending recovery in their economic life. It is useless to blind ourselves to an obvious fact. Therefore it will be necessary in some cases to make still further temporary adjustments.

The Congress has shared with the Executive in the past the consideration of questions arising from these debts. I am sure that it will commend itself to the Congress, that the legislative branch of the Government should continue to share this responsibility. In order that we should be in position to deal with the situation, I recommend the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission, with authority to examine such problems as may arise in connection with these debts during the present economic emergency, and to report to the Congress its conclusions and recommendations.

There, Mr. President, is the message of the President. Not a single, solitary word is said concerning what transpired after the 20th day of June, 1931. All the governments of the earth that were interested accepted the proposal contained in the agreement between France and our Government of July 6, saying that conditions had changed. There in their protocol is their view on August 11 that these conditions had changed. Here in this country, notwithstanding other nations believed in the changed conditions, notwithstanding it was conceded by those high in power that there had been a change in the conditions that had existed, not a single solitary word, not a single sentence is found in the message of the President to the Congress on the 10th day of December, 1931, in relation to those changes.

I do not approve—

Says the President—

in any remote sense, of the cancellation of the debts due to us.

I make no play upon words and I do not assume, as one would have the right to assume, that "remote" might be read in the context in which it is used, to indicate that he had no remote but a very near idea. I take it that what he means is—and I make no play upon the word—that even remotely he does not intend to consider cancellation of debts. His language is unfortunate, as unfortunate, I am sorry to say—because I am always irritated when I see it—as the split infinitive in which his literary secretaries indulge. Passing the construction of the language, forgetting the split infinitives of the literary secretaries, let us see what is meant by his statement that he does not even remotely believe in cancellation of the debts.

It is perfectly obvious that he does believe in scaling down the debts. It is perfectly plain from the remainder of the message that he does believe in reduction of the debts. I was delighted to have the testimony of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] that they were unalterably opposed not only to cancellation of the debts but unalterably opposed to any reduction or any revamping of the debt settlements that had been made. But that is not the position of the President of the United States. It is not his position, for he states, and states it here so that there is no misunderstanding:

As we approach the new year it is clear that a number of the governments indebted to us will be unable to meet further payments to us in full pending recovery in their economic life. It is useless to blind ourselves to an obvious fact. Therefore it will be necessary in some cases to make still further temporary adjustments.

There is only one meaning to that, of course. It will be necessary, in his opinion, to indulge in reductions or in modifications of the debt settlement, and in reductions undoubtedly to the debtors who are indebted to us. To make that perfectly plain he asks for the re-creation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. Of course, we would not re-create the World War Foreign Debt Commission for the purpose, as was well said yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], of revising upward. We would re-create it for the purpose of revising downward. That goes without saying, and none, I take it, will deny it.

So the President of the United States in his message to the Congress on December 10 said substantially that he favors reduction of some debts and the re-creation of the World War Debt Commission in order that that may be accomplished. Oh, what a dreadful state; what a terrible situation is here presented. Oh, how the mighty have fallen, and how their views have been changed, perhaps contaminated by association with men upon this floor, for here we find the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] in disagreement with the President of the United States and taking a position directly opposite to that which is taken by him. If it is excusable in them, on what theory is it inexcusable in you? I do not say inexcusable in me, because that is a matter of absolute and complete indifference so far as I am concerned. But I read in the debates upon the floor of the Congress of man after man asserting that the President had done something he ought not to do, but because he had done it they were going to vote for it—a philosophy of government which, if carried to its logical extreme, would mean no government at all and no Congress at all. Of course, I can not subscribe to that kind of philosophy.

But the awfulness of the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Pennsylvania being against any debt cancellation or debt reduction at all is something that after all should stir the hearts of every one of us in this body and make us feel, during these hectic days in this land, that after all there are Senators of one degree and Senators of another degree in this body who disagree with the President, and it is a very difficult thing to have a line of demarcation between those of the one degree and those of the other. So as to our friends disagreeing with the President, I congratulate them because they are right. I congratulate them because the debts ought not to be scaled down and they ought not to be canceled.

There is only one way in my opinion to deal with those debts, just one way. Stand our ground in reference to those debts! Let any nation default that desires to do so. Let any nation that wishes refuse to pay what we legitimately and rightfully ought to be paid. Maintain our position in reference to those debts and let any debtor of ours default that desires to default.

We are pretty close to having learned our lesson now. We knew it for 100 or more years. We forgot it in the last 15 years. We are learning it over again to-day. Let Europe default if Europe desires to default. I doubt if many of the nations will default, but let them default if they desire; and once they have defaulted we will know just where we stand and we will not again commit the errors which have been committed in the last 15 years in this country.

It is a dreadful thing to hear the evidence that has been developed before the Finance Committee. Only three witnesses have been called, but by the testimony of those three witnesses it has been established that over $4,000,000,000 have been invested abroad by Americans; $4,000,000,000 that are worth not a tithe of the amount that originally was invested. Mad men, perhaps, were they; mad banks, perhaps, were the banks; mad, indeed, perhaps were the international bankers; but the profits were before them; they saw, as they said, that it was a commercial transaction; they were engaged in that kind of commerce; and over $4,000,000,000, out of the mouths of three witnesses it has been established, have been invested abroad by the American public.

Let us learn just where we stand; let us stand upon our debts; and when any nation defaults we will understand the implications. If we do not pursue that policy, if we grant moratorium after moratorium to those debtors of ours, then we shall simply be utilizing the modes that they have utilized to take us further into Europe and take us into further financial disaster and adventure there. So let us stand our ground on our debts. Let them default, if they will; and when they default, then we shall go back to the old American rule and the old American tradition perhaps; then we shall be just American again.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I understood the Senator from California to state that the bankers had sold $4,000,000,000 worth of foreign loans to the American people?

Mr. JOHNSON. I speak in round numbers; but, according to my recollection, it is over $4,000,000,000 that three witnesses testified Americans have put into foreign securities.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator know how much the international bankers made on those transactions?

Mr. JOHNSON. No. In the case of the Morgan house it has to be computed upon what they call the "spread." The Mitchell establishment, the National City Bank, showed a profit of about $26,000,000, according to my recollection of the testimony.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not know but that the Senator from California had computed the figures.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not computed them all. I am having that done, however.

Mr. WHEELER. I think it would be extremely interesting if we knew how many billion dollars those bankers loaded on to the American public; how much profit they made as commissions, and how much those securities are worth at the present time. It would show, it seems to me, what "suckers" the American people had been in buying those foreign bonds upon the say-so of these self-styled merchants of New York.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that all of that will be developed; we have only just started on the investigation, and before we conclude I think all of those facts will be thoroughly developed.

Mr. WHEELER. As I understand, all those loans were made subsequent to the World War, were they not?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; all the loans of which I have been speaking were made subsequent to the World War.

I say we were in a drunken orgy of speculation during that period; there is not any doubt about it. The gentlemen who appeared before us made no bones of the fact that they were dealing commercially with that sort of thing, and, of course, they "put over" what they could in order that their profits might be made; and that they made great profits there is not any doubt whatsoever.

All those things have been done, and now that our fingers have been burned we understand something of what it is we are dealing with. Now, however, we are dealing not with those particular individuals or with those who may have mistakenly bought bonds abroad but we are dealing with the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker; we are dealing with men, women, and children in the United States; we are dealing with them to-day, and because there have been blunders made in the world, because there is a cataclysmic effect concerning the economy of some countries we are saying—God save the mark!—That we will put upon the backs of all the men, women, and children of the United States a deficit of $250,000,000, and we will make them foot the bill; that is what I oppose. For the love of God, are there not enough Americans in this body to stand here for the American and against his unjust taxation? Talk to me about distress abroad! Tell me that business there is stagnant, that people there go hungry. Good heavens!

In the city from which I come, that never before knew poverty, that has no slums, we feed 8,000 men to-day, men who in the main are just as good as you and just as good as I. We are feeding there the hungry. I see business men with whom I have associated going down the street with haggard faces, worried about where they will be to-morrow.

Let us cast our eyes upon America for a brief period. Do not be European minded when distress stalks in our land. Look here at your own; help the others if you wish ultimately, but look here to your own; help your own people, your own Americans. That is the plea I make. Do not look across the water all the time; do not look to Europe in every phase of every economic difficulty; but look here at America and at Americans. That is the plea that I am trying to make; and we are justified in dealing with this subject in the fashion that I suggest, because certain conditions were unwittingly misrepresented during the period when some Senators and Representatives signed upon the dotted line.

I have shown from the President's message how he neglected to tell you of the events subsequent to the events of June 20, 1931. It was done unwittingly, of course, because when I read the interpolation to the Senator from Utah he said, "That is right; it is a fine thing; that ought to be said to our people." He agreed with me that that kind of frank statement was the one that should be put before the people of the United States and should be told to the Senate of the United States and to the Congress. Unfortunately, we have to dig into the facts ourselves and determine them, and the great Finance Committee—pardon the implied criticism—takes the testimony of Mr. Ogden Mills, which is not even printed for the use of the Senate when this particular matter comes before the Senate. Why all this haste?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. AUSTIN in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I think the testimony is printed and on the Senator's desk at this minute.

Mr. JOHNSON. It may have been printed and placed on the desk this morning. I said, however—do not misunderstand me, because the Senator is going to correct me—that when this question came before us it was not printed.

Mr. REED. That is right.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what I said; that is correct. All right. The Senator from Pennsylvania and I agree as to that; we even agree, as I have demonstrated, on the noncancellation of debts and their nonreduction. Now, is not that fine?

Mr. REED. We agree on lots of things.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course, we agree on lots of things; but the difficulty is we disagree with the President on this, and that is a terrible thing. [Laughter.]

Just after the moratorium was put into effect what happened? The sum of $250,000,000 that belongs to this country, $250,000,000 that could be applied to the deficit which our people are going to pay for, $250,000,000 in round numbers, was paid during the last six months, as Melchoir testified, in short-term credits. Who holds those credits I do not know. I assume, of course, the banks hold them; I assume that is the natural place where those short-term credits should be. So $250,000,000, that is going to be put upon the backs of the American taxpayers, has been utilized for the payment really of the obligations held by the banks. Mr. President, do you realize that fact? Relief of Germany! Oh, yes, what a picture is painted; what a tale is told of the necessity for the relief of Germany, and, when the relief comes, to whom does it go? Who got the money? Two hundred and fifty million dollars, substantially the amount that we forgave our debtors, is paid in short-term credits unquestionably to the banks that held those short-term credits.

It may be said there is not any evidence before us concerning the short-term credits. There is one little bit of evidence thus far—we will have, if the Finance Committee will indulge me, some further evidence, I hope; but we have from the representative of J. P. Morgan & Co. the statement that one bank in New York City holds $70,000,000 of these short-term credits. He says, of course—and he is entirely right about that—that that does not affect in the slightest degree the standing or the solvency of the bank. That, however, is neither here nor there. One bank in New York City has $70,000,000 of these short-term credits. Seventy million dollars is a mere "bag of shells," of course, with which none of us should concern ourselves; but $70,000,000 is a pretty large percentage for one American bank to hold of these short-term credits; and, of course, if the bankers can have their way at the meeting that is being held abroad to-day, they will make these short-term credits and these obligations that are private in character take precedence over governmental obligations—a thing which would be, in my opinion and the opinion of most of us, an utterly outrageous thing to do. There, however, is the situation. Short-term credits to the amount of $70,000,000 are held by a single bank in New York City. Why should they not be for cancellation? Why should they not want our foreign debts scaled down? Why should they not be for a moratorium and for moratoria from now until all of the debts shall have sunk into insignificance? Why should they not be? They are to make their money out of such transactions; that is what they are for; that is why they conduct their business. That is all right; let us not complain of them; they are transacting their business and making their money; but, for the love of humanity, when we are willing to accord them the right to transact their business and make their money, can we not think for a quarter of a second of the man who is to-day in this country of ours tramping about broke, who has the right to transact his business and make his money and to transact his business and make his money undeterred, unbent, and unhurt by the Government of the United States saddling upon him additional debts and additional taxation?

Now, let me turn with you for a minute to the joint resolution that is before us. I turn to that joint resolution because, first, I want to compliment the House of Representatives upon the amendment they put in it. I congratulate the House of Representatives upon that amendment because it does declare, even though it may be a mere gesture, a policy on the part of the United States that ought to have been declared long ago, and that in stentorian tones every one of us ought to reecho. It says, in section 5:

> It is hereby expressly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced; and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy or as implying that favorable consideration will be given at any time to a change in the policy hereby declared.

The House did an excellent thing, they did a fine thing, when they did that; and it is a matter of the utmost regret to me that when the Ways and Means Committee of the House voted upon this amendment every Republican upon that committee save one voted against it. I say it is a matter of deep regret that the Republican Party, in which my allegiance may be tenuous, if you prefer, but to which I do, after all, belong—that the Republican members of the House Ways and Means Committee, with one exception, objected to and voted against that particular amendment, inserted, I think, by the member from Arkansas.

Why do you suppose they did it? Did they do it, because they believed that it was unnecessary or because they believed that it was contrary to the policy of the national administration? I leave to you to determine which.

But now will you do me the kindness, you who are here at this late hour, to follow me for a moment upon the language of this joint resolution, because this language, in my opinion, does not express what it ought to express?

> That in each of the following countries—

Then citing them—

> the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to make, on behalf of the United States, an agreement with the government of such country to postpone the payment of any amount payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, by such country to the United States in respect of its bonded indebtedness to the United States, except that in the case of Germany the agreement shall relate only to amounts payable by Germany to the United States during such fiscal year in respect of the costs of the army of occupation.
> SEC. 2. Each such agreement on behalf of the United States shall provide for the payment of the postponed amounts, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum beginning July 1, 1933, in 10 equal annuities, the first to be paid during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1933, and one during each of the nine fiscal years following, each annuity to be payable in one or more installments.

Now read section 3 with me, if you please:

> SEC. 3. No such agreement shall be made with the government of any country unless it appears to the satisfaction of the President that such government has made, or has given satisfactory assurances of willingness and readiness to make, with the government of each of the other countries indebted to such country in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts, an agreement in respect of such debt substantially similar to the agreement authorized by this joint resolution to be made with the government of such creditor country on behalf of the United States.

If it is expected to enter into agreements whereby a part of reparations shall be permitted to be paid to France, your joint resolution in frankness and in fairness should state that fact. If it is intended that all the reparations that are due to France from Germany should be foregone for a period of time by France, that fact should be stated in the joint resolution; and it certainly is not frank with the American people to have a section of this joint resolution reading that these countries, "in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts," shall execute "an agreement * * * substantially similar" to that which we execute with the other countries of the earth. It is not a fair proposition thus to express the situation, and it does not state the fact.

It is true that in the beginning of section 3 of the joint resolution it is asserted:

> No such agreement shall be made * * * unless it appears to the satisfaction of the President that such government has made—

And so forth, a similar agreement in regard to reparations, and the like. We know that it will appear to the satisfaction of the President that there has been a similar agreement made if all the reparations that are unconditional in character were to be accorded to France. That is just what has been done, and it ought not to be left to any uncertain construction in the future.

I intend, before we conclude, to offer an amendment to strike out "unless it appears to the satisfaction of the President," and to add at the end of that section "that reparations mean both conditional and unconditional reparations." Why not? Why not? Tell me the reason that you make a preferred creditor of one country and not of another. While I recognize that an amendment of that character may not be able to accomplish what I desire, and may not be passed, nevertheless it ought to be passed, and the joint resolution ought to show on its face exactly, so the American people can understand exactly what is to be done. The joint resolution as it is written to-day does nothing of the sort, for it describes that which we are to have in return for our moratorium. It says that the other countries indebted to such country "in respect of war, relief, or reparation debts" shall execute a similar agreement; and the proponents of the resolution do not intend anything of the kind. The pretense of the resolution is that we forgive our debtors and they forgive Germany her debts to them. This is mere pretense, for France does nothing of the sort. Either let the resolution honestly state the facts, and all of them, or insist upon the original proposal of the President to which you assented so readily.

Now, a word to you about the debts.

There has been a great to-do and a great hullabaloo about what these debts mean, and as to just exactly what may transpire if we insist upon those debts. There has been, as has been stated upon this floor by more than one Senator, a propaganda abroad in this land for the last couple of years in the endeavor to make us scale down and forgive the debts that are owing us by foreign nations. Let us see, by reducing it to ordinary terms, what these debts mean.

They are not a great burden to the countries that owe us. There is not any reason why they can not be paid. If you reduce to every common terms just exactly what they mean, you will have, perhaps, a better understanding of what these debts are.

I read to you from an article by Prof. William W. Cumberland, of New York City, on interallied debts. He said:

In the last year these countries paid, principal and interest, some $215,000,000 to the United States Treasury on war-debt account. This is a large sum, but it amounted to but one-half of 1 per cent of the estimated national incomes of the countries which made the payments. When put in those terms I am sure it does not seem so formidable.

Furthermore, when we correlate the payments which are being made to various other factors in the economic and financial structure we find again that exaggeration, even gross exaggeration, has been customary. In the case of the countries concerned, for example, we find that these payments amount to 2.7 per cent of their annual budgets. They spend more than that for almost any other purpose that seems agreeable. For instance, take armaments alone. We find that they spend eight times as much for armaments, certainly an expenditure within their own volition. They can decide to spend eight times as much for armaments, not including pensions, as they pay us on war-debt account. Then, on the basis of foreign trade the payments amount to 1.1 per cent; that is, of the total volume of the foreign trade of the respective countries.

You can see, when you consider these percentages, how all the arguments that are made about how the trade of this country would go to pieces, and the like, if we do not grant this moratorium, are just so much moonshine.

The article proceeds:

So when we hear that we are impoverishing the countries concerned, let us remember that we are taking one-half of 1 per cent of their annual income; when we hear that we are crushing them under a load of taxation, let us remember that it is 2.7 per cent of their budgets; when we hear that trade is being thrown into demoralization, let us remember that it is 1.1 per cent of the trade of the countries in question.

Let us reduce the matter to a per capita basis. Each Englishman pays to the United States, or, better still, transfers the equivalent of $3.60 per year on debt account; each Frenchman transfers 80 cents; each Italian transfers 12 cents; not per day, nor per week, nor per month, but per year.

When reduced to that basis I am sure that the war debts are not the frightful ogre that has sometimes been portrayed.

We have heard that the United States is enriching itself at the expense of its debtors. Each of us here receives on an average one-half cent a day on war-debt account. To put the illustration in somewhat different form, we can phrase it this way: Each German is called upon at present under the terms of the Young plan to sacrifice himself to the extent of 1 beer per day in order to meet his reparation payments. Each Britisher has to deprive himself of going to the movies once a month; each Frenchman has to give up once a year a bottle of moderately good wine; each Italian has to refuse to smoke one cigar a year, so that his debt can be paid.

A homely way of putting this situation, but illustrating something of these debts and how they are not the awful burdens that Europe would have us believe.

At this point, Mr. President, I desire to insert in the RECORD the amount due under the debts and as well the amount paid by each of the countries in question for armaments. This shows, in totals, $1,800,000,000, in round figures, paid for armaments; $243,000,000 due for debt—about 8 to 1; and then assert that we are treating harshly any other country on earth!

I ask permission to insert that table at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Country	For armaments	For debt to United States
Belgium	$23,247,347	$7,950,000
Czechoslovakia	41,056,000	3,000,000
France	547,133,935	50,000,000
Great Britain	608,024,880	159,520,000
Italy	322,337,000	14,706,000
Poland	122,995,000	7,486,000
Rumania	67,061,000	800,000
Yugoslavia	47,491,000	250,000
Total	1,779,346,162	243,712,000

Mr. JOHNSON. There is a very distinguished gentleman who is writing at the present time, and writing with a felicity of expression which I wish I could emulate; and with an eloquence, too, that I believe but very few writers possess. That is Mr. Claude G. Bowers, whom we have read, of course, in his works of historical character and which are most delightful and entertaining. He had an article recently entitled "Lady Bountiful in Run-down Heels," and a part of that I want to read to you:

The London News Chronicle, commenting on the revelations on American conditions in the President's message, concludes that "the United States is a very sick country," and the London Morning Telegraph says: "President Hoover unfolded a melancholy story, showing that the Federal Treasury is in a far worse position than the British exchequer."

Now, let me call this to your attention: When gentlemen talk to me of what is transpiring abroad, let me say to them, Where is the biggest deficit to-day in the world? It is in the United States Treasury. Whenever any other country prates about its deficit and the necessity for balancing its budget, let me say that here at home is the biggest task in the world now for the balancing of a budget and for the removal of a treasury deficit.

Let me point to what is being done to-day. Oh, there is little thought of those upon whom the burden is to be placed. Says the President in a recent message, there is a deficit of something over $900,000,000; I think I quote him exactly, I intend to do so at least. He says, "There is a deficit of over $900,000,000 to be met this year." How is that to be met? It is to be met by the most drastic peace-time taxes ever exacted of our people in times of peace. Do Senators realize that? There is a deficit of nine hundred and some odd millions of dollars. Two hundred and fifty million dollars is the amount we are asked to give away to those who owe us. Practically 25 per cent of the deficit which must be raised and met in this country arises from the fact that you to-day are voting to England, to France, and to Italy $250,000,000. Do you realize that?

Talk of budgets in England, talk of budgetary requirements in France. Here is the Budget which ought to concern the Congress, with a deficit of possibly $3,000,000,000 to face the American people in the future. Talk of taxes abroad, and of the necessity for helping Europe. Here is where the taxes must be levied upon men who are already broke financially, men who are holding on to a little equity, hoping that they may pursue their lives again, and may again pick up the thread which seems broken with them. Here is the deficit, and with that deficit facing you, you are giving away $250,000,000 which belongs to your taxpayers, giving it away upon a moratorium which has never been adequately described to you, and the facts concerning which were not written into the message of the President of the United States which came here on the 10th day of December last.

So, giving away $250,000,000, you give it away, and then you make your people here in America pay for it. Do you not remember what came out of the war? No spoil was ours. The proudest thing America ever did was to do its duty in a great World War and ask neither reparations nor spoils. Who has the spoil of that war, spoil of the value which the imagination can hardly conceive? Who has the spoil of that war? Great Britain, France, Italy, and some other nations, perhaps, but those three in reality. They have all the spoil of the war. Every bit of it is theirs.

Who had the reparations? Not ourselves or our country at all. Our country refused both the spoil of war and reparations of any kind. These debtors of ours are the ones who, clinging to their spoil, are seeking to-day to put the very cost of all the war upon the American people, and you to-day are going to assist them to put the cost of all that war upon the American people.

They have that spoil yet. Talk to me of peace in Europe, talk to me of a stable political economy there. There is only one way in which you can accomplish that. You wrote, with your bankrupt statesmanship, the treaty of Versailles, which has within it the germs of future war, which none can foresee, but all can feel at present.

You wrote, with your bankrupt statesmanship, at Paris during that time the instrument which has led to the difficulties which exist now all over the world. You want peace, you who cry about it on every occasion. You want stability of government, and you want economic stability. You can have those things in just one way: Rewrite the treaty of Versailles, take all the spoil that was taken under that treaty, take it back, and distribute it justly and legitimately. That is the only way by which peace will come and by which stability of governments will come.

Yet it would not be possible to get those who are interested most, those who prate most of peace, those who talk loudest of economic stability abroad to sit down and rewrite the treaty of Versailles, and right the wrongs which were written into that particular instrument.

The amendment which has been offered here by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is the only fashion in which you can ever bring stability economically, or permanent peace.

I return to the article of Mr. Bowers, to which I have referred:

> To Americans who have been fed by the administration on Pollyanna reassurances this will be startling. We are constantly hearing from administration quarters that the United States is most fortunate in not being in such a bad condition as the countries of Europe. We have pointed out the insincerity of this statement many times. It is sheer nonsense, it is pure fabrication to imply that France is in as bad a condition as the United States. In comparison, France is rolling in prosperity, without our deficit, without our necessity enormously to increase taxes, and with but 300,000 jobless men to our 6,500,000.
> In England, as the London paper says, the exchequer is not confronted, even proportionately, with anything like the deficit that confronts us now; and proportionately she has no more unemployed than we have.
>
> We are now forced to submit to a most drastic increase in taxation, which is not likely to hasten the return of normal conditions.
>
> Under these circumstances, what is to be said of a Government that will agree to transfer the debts of England, France, and the other debtor nations from the shoulders of their taxpayers to the backs of our own?
>
> Lady Bountiful in Rags is up against the bread-and-butter proposition now.
> UNABLE TO MAKE BOTH ENDS MEET
> The press comments in Berlin reveal the fact that Germany has had no idea of the seriousness of the crisis here. "Germania" finds evidence in the President's confession of "a worse depression in the United States than had been generally apparent." To the nations prone to look upon us as the world's Santa Claus, it must be disturbing to learn that we ourselves are unable at present to make both ends meet.
> It is going to take some time to balance our own Budget; and it will be longer before we again smugly and sternly call on Europe to balance hers. Certainly we are in no condition to play the benefactor of mankind by taking over the debts of other nations and paying them out of the pockets of our own people.
> There is not a scintilla of doubt that the administration, in its policies and through its conversations with the debtor nations, is moving toward further reductions or, what it amounts to in the end, the transfer of the debts of other nations to the taxpayers of this country. This plan, ready or in the making, is to be imposed upon us because our bankers have made extravagant private loans in Europe which can not be readily liquidated if the people in the nations where the loans were placed are to be taxed to repay what they borrowed from the American Government. The "butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker" are to be taxed to pay the debts of foreign governments, so that the private loan may be paid at good interest to the American banker.

Will you stop for a moment to figure what it means to the American people individually to put upon their backs now $250,000,000 more? If you take 125,000,000 people as residing in the United States, you can say with accuracy that $250,000,000 in additional taxes would mean to every man, woman, and child in the United States $2. If you take a family of five, it means to every family of five $10. If you take the taxable people in the United States and add to their burden these additional taxes, it will mean probably $30 to every one of these taxable people.

That is not much, you say, $30. It is not much; but I have known men the past nine months who never felt the press before in all their lives, who could not put their hands upon $30 even to aid them in the effort to rehabilitate themselves.

Oh, it does not mean much, perhaps, to the American people, say you, $30 for a man to be taxed in order to pay these debts. But for what? So that the short-term credits of international bankers may be paid out of the pockets of American taxpayers.

Figure it in any way you will, it is a wrong which you commit by this moratorium. The moratorium in the beginning was one thing. The moratorium as agreed upon subsequently was an entirely different thing. The moratorium which is quoted by the President of the United States in his message is a vastly different thing from the moratorium to which he agreed with France. The moratorium referred to in the joint resolution is not described with the accuracy and the frankness and the candor with which a moratorium of that sort should be described.

Beyond that, when you pass this moratorium, you permit an invasion of the Constitution of the United States and the prerogative of the Senate of the United States by the executive branch of the Government, and once you permit that invasion, and once you permit the Constitution to be avoided in this fashion, look out for the breaches which may occur in the days to come.

Mr. President, I am through. What little I have been able to say, sir, on this subject I have said. I am glad to stand alone here, if it is necessary to stand alone. Thank God, I have learned in my life to have the guts to stand alone when it is necessary to stand alone. I do not care how much power there may be in the administration. It is a matter of indifference to me how these international bankers may view an action of mine of any kind or of any character. I disdain these political puppets who poll-parrot the Pecksniffian phrases of these international bankers. Sir, I am ready to stand before the American people upon a proposition such as that advanced here to-day.

Here is the parting of the ways, sir, in a matter of grave concern to the American Government; grave concern not alone in the legislation that is being enacted, but grave concern in relation to the cherished institutions of this Nation and the perpetuity in its pristine purity of our Constitution.

I recall, sir, a story told me long ago that subsequently I found was historically accurate. It was a story of the later part of the Civil War, the story of a general who had just come out of the West, of a little stocky, silent man whom few knew and fewer still understood. He, following his predecessors, had taken the old Grand Army of the Republic across the Rapidan to battle that great commander of the Confederacy, Robert E. Lee, great man and great commander both. He, like his predecessors, had marched down into the wilderness there. Some days of battle ensued without result and without victory upon his part; only defeat. The Grand Army of the Republic turned from that contest, turned to go back, as it had done in all the previous contests, to cross the Rapidan to safety.

Stern, white lipped, those grim old warriors turned in retreat just as they had turned on every other occasion, marching back along the road to the crossroads on their route. At the crossroads one road led across the Rapidan to safety. The other one led back to the bloody fray, led on to that which was the goal of every Union general. When the vanguard of the army reached those crossroads, when the first of the men reach there, they knew they were going to learn for the first time the kind of commander that had come to them and to ascertain whether he was to be exactly as those who had preceded him, and whether they were to continue the well-worn path of retreat. Grim old warriors were they of many battles. When they reached that crossroad came the command, "Turn to the right! March on toward Richmond!" And there began at the head of that column a song, a song of thanksgiving and of victory. It swept back 20 long miles among those men of blue, swept back among that whole army, until it sent them upon the harder way, to travel the path to glory and to death, but the path that led finally to ultimate victory and to Appomattox.

To-day we are standing at the crossroads of the destiny of the United States of America. There is an easy way—retreat across the Rapidan to safety, where those afraid may counsel us, and foreign nations may approve. There is another way, just the American way. It is a hard way. Temporary setbacks will be ours and temporary difficulties will be met; but beyond it is the goal where the sun is shining, shining upon America and Americans. Let us take the American road.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from California has inquired with more or less feeling what the American people are getting out of this moratorium. When they pay $250,000,000 on account of the moratorium the Senator seems to have some curiosity to know what the American people are getting out of it. I would say to the Senator that they have the consolation of knowing that the world is safe for democracy. It sounds pretty harsh, but I assume it is worth the price.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I think what the Senator means is that when the Republican Party does this thing the country is safe for democracy. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORE. I accept the suggestion.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment to the pending joint resolution and to have it read, printed, and lie on the table.

The amendment was ordered to be printed and to lie upon the table, and was read, as follows:

In section 5, page 3, line 12, after the word "reduced," insert the words "or postponed," so as to make the section read:

"SEC. 5. It is hereby expressly declared to be against the policy of Congress that any of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States should be in any manner canceled or reduced or postponed; and nothing in this joint resolution shall be construed as indicating a contrary policy, or as implying that favorable consideration will be given at any time to a change in the policy hereby declared."

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, after having listened to the courageous and most eloquent address by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], I hesitate to inject any thought that might be mine with relation to the joint resolution pending before the Senate, because I too well realize what the comparison will afford between the address of the Senator from California and my own poor efforts.

The Senator from California has impressed upon the Senate, or those who have listened to him, at least the thought that America has fast been drifting away from a policy dictated by the interest of the American people and into a course which has found the Government led for the most part by selfishness and greed, dictated by a mere handful of men who have been bent upon congregating into their own hands and into their own control the wealth not alone of the Nation but of the world. With that wealth has come to them a power the like of which no individual and no group of individuals in all the world's history has ever known before.

Right now, with the Nation and its people suffering a headache, the like of which its people have never before known, it would seem that we should bend our energies in the direction of alleviating the distress and suffering which exists on every hand. But we shut our eyes at least momentarily to the need of the millions of Americans and we let a little handful of men, who have made investments abroad and who are finding the going in the matter of collections rather rough, lead our Government into a road that will let the American people shoulder a little more burden, to the end that selfishness and greed, the international bankers, may have first access to whatever ability Europe might have to pay at this particular time.

I have no doubt that there is distress in Europe, in every nation of the world; but I think the Senator from California clearly pictured in his closing remarks that the other nations of the world are perhaps in no different predicament or no sorer plight than is the United States. That headache of which I have spoken is world-wide. If America could do so, America would like to help Europe. If it were possible for me to lend myself to any program which would afford a lasting degree of relief for Europe, I certainly would not hold back in assistance that I might afford to that end. But in doing it I would make sure that we were doing for Europe only what we were perfectly willing and ready to do for our own people here at home.

While Europe is in distress, is unable, seemingly, to make its efforts win those returns that will enable it to keep up with the terrific interest payments expected of it, we have the same identical situation here at home. With our farm people, one-third of the population of the country, striving energetically to make their efforts win that kind of return that will enable them to pay their taxes and to pay interest upon their obligations, we find that instead of enjoying success by reason of that effort their names are in the newspapers of the land week after week and day after day in items revealing foreclosure proceedings upon properties and upon homesteads to the possession of which they have devoted lives of toil. Yet, apparently, their interests are not our interests here to-day. Our interests seemingly are those, first of all, of making sure that those who have engaged in this selfish, greedy program of so many years are not going to lose their chance to collect continued interest and payments upon the obligations due them from Europe.

We are offering to Europe at this time a postponement of payments due during the year of approximately $250,000,000. As money goes, as amounts go these days, $250,000,000 perhaps is not so much; but when we stop to consider that that amount must be added to the burden which is now depressing the United States I think we have a right to challenge those who insist that we can better bear this burden than can Europe or than can the New York bankers who have made their advances in Europe.

The New York bankers went into Europe with their eyes wide open and made loans to the European countries which had borrowed excessively from our own Government. They knew fully well that they were perhaps enjoying only half an opportunity to collect a return upon what they had advanced. When they made the advances in Europe they must have known that if there was to be any defaulting on the part of Europe, in all fairness that defaulting ought to be made to fall upon all creditors alike; and if there were to be any moratorium, if there were to be any cancellation, if there were to be any forgetting of indebtedness, they ought to be willing to forget and they ought to be willing to postpone in the same degree that the American Government or the American people were ready to forgive or were ready to postpone what was owing them.

But, instead, to-day we find those international bankers feeling that they have a right to expect of the people and of the Government of the United States that they will postpone, that they will cancel what is owing the Government, in order that the international bankers may have easier access to whatever means Europe might have at its disposal at this time to meet its obligations.

I think, Mr. President, that sooner or later we are all going to be ready to agree that we are in an impossible state in this world and that we are never going to dig our way out of the tremendous burdens created by the debts that are occasioning such vast outlays in interest payments every year. I am sorry to have to admit it myself, but I can not for the life of me see how thousands upon thousands of farmers of my acquaintance are going to be able, under the existing order, to meet the obligations which are theirs, try as hard as they may. I do not believe that Europe is going to be able to satisfy fully the entire amount Europe is owing. So the sooner we come down in this world to a program of refinancing the sooner we are going to find ourselves again on the path that leads to something more than distress and suffering.

However, I do not suppose this is any time to be advancing any theories or programs of refinancing in the world or even in our own country. We are having to deal with what is before us. We have before us now a joint resolution proposing a postponement of payments due the United States by the various nations of Europe. If, however, we are to ignore any opportunities that might be afforded to refinance, let us, at least, in a time like this refrain from burdening the American people with any greater indebtedness than that which is already theirs. But we seem to be expected at this time to lose absolutely no time in passing this moratorium. If we do it, it will enable the international bankers to have dropped into their stocking on the morning of Christmas day a gift the like of which many Americans would be delighted to share proportionately. Give them that, and I venture to guess, Mr. President, that they will make further advances to Europe at fancy rates of interest, expecting that if ever they are in distress, if ever they are in trouble and have difficulty in collecting what is owing them, they may always depend on their dear Uncle Sam to come to the rescue; that Uncle Sam will forget anything that is coming to him to the end that the banker may have his full and complete share.

Mr. Kahn, testifying yesterday before the Senate Finance Committee, indicated that he at least would like to see private bankers get an "even break"—an "even break"—in any consideration of a debt-cancellation program. That is the first indication, Mr. President, that that crowd have even anticipated that they might participate in a program of cancellation, taking their losses along with the losses that the Government must take in a program of that kind; and I doubt now that they seriously anticipate that they will have to indulge in that sort of a loss. At least they are not offering any moratorium now. Rather they are hopeful that, before we are through, we shall have succeeded in providing for Europe a complete cancellation of all of the debts owing the United States Government. That will leave the bankers in a much better position to win back the advances they have made abroad.

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] yesterday pointed out with great energy the needs of the American farmer to-day. If, Mr. President, every Member of this body or every Member of this Congress could have close, first-hand knowledge of the situation existing in that basic American industry, I do not believe there would be any hesitancy in turning our attention, not so much to the needs of Europe, as to the needs of this class of our own people. Their distress is occasioned quite largely by the very same causes that are occasioning the distress abroad and leading to this proposal of a moratorium.

During the World War the Government of the United States said to the American farmers, "You are a most integral part in any machinery looking to the accomplishment of quick victory; the American farmer is looked to to produce that all-essential thing, the food needed to prosecute the war." The Government urged the farmers to go forth, exert their fullest energies in producing more food and more food and more food. That they did. They borrowed money; they borrowed easily on the credit then available, in order that they might buy better machinery, in order that they might buy more land, in order that they might engage that talent needed to take the place of the boys who had been drafted into the service and had gone across to do their part in winning that great conflict. The farmers went heavily into debt.

Then, with the end of the war, came the feeling on the part of the American farmer, "Well, now, we have got to watch our step, because at the end of the war there will come an end to the demand for this tremendous production which has been under way during these war years"; but when the farmer sought to caution himself thus his Government said to him, "No, you need not be watching that at all; there is no cause for alarm on your part in that respect, because for years and years and years to come American farmers are going to have to feed the war-torn nations of Europe." So the American farmer went on and on and on, producing, producing, producing those commodities which he had been taught to believe the world needed. His debts did not worry him so much, because he felt that he was doing a duty and that his Government would stand by him when judgment day, the day of reckoning, came.

Europe borrowed money to prosecute the war just as the American farmer borrowed money for the purpose of prosecuting the war. However, when the war was over, some years later, as I think, the Congress of the United States all but cancelled the entire amount of money that had been loaned to foreign governments during the World War. By our programs of refunding, Mr. President, we all but abandoned any recollection or any care concerning the enormous advances we had made to Europe during the period of the war. We are to-day, so far as their indebtedness is concerned, practically holding them alone for the advances made to them after the World War was over. They are finding it difficult to meet that debt or the payments due under it.

Likewise, Mr. President, the American farmer is finding it difficult to meet his obligations. The depression which has fallen upon the land, which struck first of all the American farmer, has left him in a position the like of which American agriculture had never before occupied. If you could visit some of these farm homes, homes of men and women who have spent lifetimes upon their lands, developing their farms, and producing crops—if you could visit them in times like these, particularly where an especially serious drouth has hit them for one or two years in succession, you would better understand what men mean when they ask: "Are we approaching that day when the American farmer is to become nothing more than the slave, the tenant of a class that has been concentrating power and wealth into its hands in such a degree as we have witnessed during the last 10 or 20 years? Is slavery, is tenancy a thing that is coming to stay?" I hope it is not; but, Mr. President, men who 10 years ago, 12 and 15 years ago, owed not one penny upon their farm properties to-day are losing those properties; to-day they are losing their homes. Why? Because, Mr. President, of obligations taken upon themselves during the war and immediately following the war in keeping with the wishes of the Government of the United States itself.

Much of the borrowings of the American farmer were made through the Federal land-bank system. Millions upon millions of dollars were thus made available to the farmers, and the payment of those debts was to be made, of course, upon the installment basis. The farmers carried on bravely; they did well through a number of years; they did well so long as there was a price for their products that would meet the cost of production and afford a little in the way of profit above that; but when prices went way below that mark, then the farmer was helpless to meet his tax and interest obligations. That farmer to-day, if he were to be given the help that the Government owes him, would be excused from having to meet those obligations for 1, 2, or 3 years, as we are excusing by this moratorium our foreign debtors from meeting their obligations. However, Mr. President, I am satisfied that if an effort were made in the Congress to make available to the farmer the same identical degree of help that we are affording through this moratorium to certain European nations, it would not even muster a good-sized minority, to say nothing of such an overwhelming majority as will, from all evidences, be accorded for the pending proposal which is to be ratified, not for Americans but for others, for foreign peoples to whom we owe no such direct and lasting debt as we do to our own people.

Mr. President, in order that the RECORD may be made very clear in this connection, I am going to try to ascertain whether this Congress is as anxious to do for its own American people as it is anxious to do for Europe and for our international bankers who have loaned such vast amounts of money to foreign nations as have been loaned. I send to the desk and ask to have read an amendment which I intend to propose to the joint resolution now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The proposed amendment will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 3, after line 15, insert the following:

"SEC. 6. Be it further resolved, That the Federal land bank be, and is hereby, authorized and ordered to enter into an agreement with such borrowers from the said bank as desire such an opportunity to postpone the payment of any amount payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, by such borrower to the said bank. Each such agreement shall provide for the payment of the postponed amounts, with interest and installments to be arranged on the same basis as are the interest and installment arrangements afforded in the agreements with those countries named in section 1 of this resolution. Where a postponement of payments by borrowers shall make it impossible for the land bank to meet its obligations to bondholders, the Treasury of the United States shall advance to the land bank such funds as may be required, not exceeding the total amount of payments postponed."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, does the Senator offer that amendment now?

Mr. NYE. I shall call it up later; I am not moving its adoption at this time.

Mr. President, I wish there could be an awakening in America to the trend that has been developing in this land during recent years. I think if that trend were more generally recognized there would be a rebellion in America the like of which a civilized people seldom have seen. It would not necessarily need to be a rebellion calling for bloodshed, calling for the sacrifice of life, but a political rebellion that would find the American people standing up and saying: "Enough of this; it is time that our policies in America were dictated by the interest and needs of the American people rather than by the interest and the needs alone of a band of international bankers, who during recent years have had pretty nearly anything and everything they have wanted and have requested from the Government of the United States."

We have just come through a period in American life that has been labeled the greatest period of prosperity a civilized people have ever known. We have all been fooling ourselves into the belief that the period during and following the war was truly a prosperous period for the American people. I deny, Mr. President, that there was any honest degree of prosperity enjoyed during that period. There was prosperity, untold prosperity, enjoyed by the few who were engaging in a program looking to further concentration of wealth here in America and throughout the world. Now, overnight, we find ourselves in the depths, though for 10 or 12 years we were boasting daily of our wonderful, unheard-of prosperity.

It occasions such stories as that one I recently heard, of the man who sat at his radio night after night, off on another world, on Mars, listening to stray waves from the world; and daily he heard the same story—the story of that great prosperity which was being enjoyed in America. Then, one evening more recently, he sat at the same radio set and heard speaker after speaker declaiming on the terrible depression that had hit this same America. He made up his mind he would like to know what in the world could be the nature of a people who could on one day occupy such heights as were boasted here in America, and on another day find itself at a depth economically such as it had never known before.

It is no part of the story, seemingly, how that man got here from Mars; but he made up his mind that he wanted to come and view with his own eyes this situation, and he came. He arrived in New York, where he encountered one of these international bankers.

He said to the banker, "I understand you have a depression down here. Is there anything to that?" The banker ruefully said, "Yes; quite a good deal of it—much of it."

"What is the matter?" said the man from Mars. "Are you short on food or something of the kind?" The man in New York said, "No, no. We are not short on food. We have too much food. That is one of our problems here in America."

"Well," said the man from Mars, "too much food; that must mean, then, that you have not enough help. You have not enough labor." Thereupon the banker confessed that we had a great army of unemployed in this country; that we had plenty of labor and no work for that labor to perform.

The man from Mars, rather perplexed, said, "Well, then, I can see it is a case of your being without any work to do. Your work is all done. There is nothing more to do"; and, naturally, the banker confessed that we had not yet even started in on the job of world construction; that there was plenty to do.

Then a thought hit the man from Mars, and he was surprised that it had not dawned on him sooner. "Why," he said, "I see now what is wrong. I see what is the matter with you down here. You have not enough money. You are short of money." Then the man from New York said, "Money? The world has more money to-day than it has ever had before."

The man from Mars responded, "Plenty of food, plenty of men to work, plenty of work to be done, more money than you have ever had before, and yet hard times and depression the like of which you have never had before! Well," he said, "you will have to excuse me, but I am going back to where I came from. I am accustomed to living among sane people, and I can not stand any more of this!"

That is the story. There is one thing about the story that is different from the usual run of stories: There is not a statement in it that does not concern itself alone with fact. Plenty of food, plenty of labor, plenty of work to be done, plenty of money, and yet hard times! And all this is a reward following that "greatest era of prosperity a nation of people has ever known," so we were told, and are still told to-day.

Mr. President, it was an era of prosperity for some few, but it was an era of anything but prosperity for millions upon millions of American people, because while the few were going forward during that period multiplying their incomes, multiplying their wealth by untold figures, the many were suffering reductions in salaries, reductions in wages and incomes to a point which, when we stop to weigh it to-day, to say the least, staggers us.

Mr. President, here we are to-day with 4 per cent of the people of America in possession of approximately 75 per cent of the wealth of America. We have observed, in the last 8 or 10 years, a drop from approximately twelve or fifteen billion dollars of farm income to a farm income of something over four billions of dollars for the last year. Sixty per cent of the corporation profits of America—and they have been the institutions enjoying the terrific profits—are collected by something like 2,000 individual American citizens. To the end that we may better see what strides have been taken in the direction of concentration, permit me to point out that in 1920, the beginning of that great "era of prosperity," there were not a great many individuals in America with incomes of a million dollars or more per year. In fact the total income of all Americans with incomes of that size was only $77,000,000. Then, after eight or nine years of the greatest prosperity, in 1929 the income-tax figures revealed that the total income of those enjoying incomes of a million dollars or more per year is no longer only $77,000,000, as it was nine years previously, but has grown to a figure of $1,200,000,000.

During the same period, Mr. President, in 1920, Americans with incomes of $5,000 a year or less, according to the income-tax returns, were enjoying a total income of $15,000,000,000. Then in 1929, after nine years of prosperity, we find that income no longer $15,000,000,000 but cut to $8,000,000,000; and it has been cut to even a lower figure since that time.

One Member of this body has presented some very interesting figures revealing that in 1929, 504 Americans had an income that was greater than all of the money paid for all of the cotton and all of the wheat produced by between two and three million farmers in America in the year 1930—504 individuals enjoying an income that was greater than that returned to the farmers for all the cotton and wheat produced in this country in a year!

Mr. President, is not that food for thought? Is it not food for thought when you find 504 individual Americans enjoying an income that is sufficient to have enabled them to pay, if they had wanted to pay, the salaries and wages of all of the men and all of the women employed in the railway train service of all the railroads in America for a single year, and still have had a balance left which, had it been equally divided among the 504, would have given them the substantial sum of $800,000 a year apiece to have tried to maintain themselves and their families upon?

From 1922 to 1928, Mr. President, the wealth of this Nation of ours increased by something like 12½ per cent. During the same period the wealth of 200 of America's leading corporations increased by 45 per cent. Into the hands of the few, into the coffers of the few, there has been drawn and is being drawn the wealth of this land on a scale the like of which neither America nor any other nation of people has ever known before. Unless we check that trend, unless we find a way to redistribute wealth, unless we halt this program which ultimately invites destruction for this great democracy, Mr. President, we might better forget the needs of other nations, knowing fully well the distress that is remaining for America to face.

Yet, instead of meeting this problem—instead of meeting this problem occasioned by selfishness and greed, bent upon that concentration of wealth—we go forward as we are going forward here now, offering to those very individuals opportunity further to enhance their own wealth, further to aggregate the wealth of the land, at the cost and at the expense of the American people!

Mr. President, we have with us to-day this thing we call depression alone because we have ignored for so many years the very first laws of a democracy, the very first principles laid down by those fathers who were building for a happy, contented race of people. We have but ourselves to blame for it. We have followed courses, during more recent years especially, that have been courses calculated "not to rock the boat." "Do not disturb the present order. Things are going to come back all right if you just sit quiet and let them take their own course."

Mr. President, what we have to-day is the very situation that it was prophesied 75 years ago would be the lot of America if they did not reach out and destroy that power which was aiming to accomplish this aggregation of wealth in the hands of the few.

Lincoln in 1864, in writing to William P. Elton, said this:

> I see in the near future a crisis approaching that unnerves me and causes me to tremble for the safety of my country. * * * As a result [of the war] corporations have been enthroned, and an era of corruption in high places will follow, and the money power of the country—
>
> "The money power of the country!"—
> will endeavor to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people until all the wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic is destroyed. I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of my country than ever before, even in the midst of war. God grant that my suspicions may prove groundless!

Mr. President, unless the joint resolution be amended I shall vote against this moratorium plan, first because I believe Americans are needing aid as greatly as Europeans are needing the kind of aid proposed in this joint resolution. I shall vote against it, because, too, I have not yet found the international bankers, who stand to profit by this moratorium arrangement, ready to suffer losses on a par with those taken by the American people through any debt-cancellation program.

I shall press later on for that consideration I hope for upon the amendment proposing that the American farmer who has borrowed money from the Federal land-bank system shall have access to the same kind of graciousness at the hands of his Government that we are extending to the nations of Europe and the international bankers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in further considering the moratorium, I think it would probably be wise to have a word or two to say about the history of the transaction.

America has been unusually generous to our allies. First we loaned them more than $12,000,000,000—a little more than $9,000,000,000 before the armistice was signed and more than $3,000,000,000 since. In addition to that, we sent 2,000,000 men across the Atlantic Ocean to fight for the cause which was represented by the Allies. In addition to that, we raised some $15,000,000,000, and put that tax burden upon the American people, for the purpose of carrying on the war. We raised that in cash. We raised over $25,000,000,000 in bonds for the purpose of carrying on that war. When the war began, we owed less than a billion dollars. The highest point our debts reached after the war was $26,500,000,000, in round figures. So $25,500,000,000 represents our increase in our bonded debt resulting from the war.

In addition to expending all that money, and putting those enormous tax burdens upon the American people at that time for the purpose of helping win the war for our allies, what else did we do? In lending our allies the money, we took their notes at 5 per cent interest, and they were to pay the money back to us. That was perhaps the cheapest money nations in war ever borrowed in all the history of time.

Those nations were paying the same international bankers who have been mentioned here to-day interest rates largely in excess of 5 per cent, and those allied nations were delighted to get from the American Government the money at 5 per cent interest when we entered the war.

When the war was over our generosity did not end. We furnished $100,000,000 for those suffering in Europe and put it in Mr. Hoover's hands for distribution. We loaned our allies, as I stated before, some $3,000,000,000 after the armistice was signed for the purpose of rehabilitating their countries. We sold them supplies at a mere tithe of what those supplies were worth; and, by the way, we have never really received more than nominal sums for these $2,000,000 worth of supplies.

Then came propaganda for a reduction and an adjustment of those debts, and the American Government appointed a debt-funding commission. Mr. Hoover was a member of that commission. As I pointed out last week, that debt commission virtually canceled every war debt and merely held our allies for the money loaned them after the war or for money borrowed for commercial purposes. That was very generous conduct. We have been exceedingly generous to our allies.

How do they repay us? I realize that some are in such a position that they may not vote just as they would like after the arguments are made; but I want to call the attention of Senators to what our allies think about us after all this generosity upon the part of America. I read, first, from the New York Times of December 17 of this year:

> FRENCH GIBE AT WASHINGTON CONCERNING DEBT SITUATION
> PARIS, December 16.—Many morals for future conduct are being drawn in Paris out of the situation in Washington over reparations and debts.
> Pertinax, in the Echo de Paris, says: "Never trust White House action. It is sure to be overthrown by the Senate."
> Another moral is similar: "Never trust the American Senate or House of Representatives. They are quite capable of signing a debt-settlement agreement and then asking for more."

I stop here long enough to say, Senators, that these are the people for whom we are taking $253,000,000 in money out of the Federal Treasury, giving it to them as a dole, as a gift, without rhyme or reason, as I believe I can show.

I continue reading from the article:

> Another is: "Don't put your trust in any American plan. Remember the league covenant, the treaty of Versailles, the Dawes plan, and the Young plan, and now the Hoover plan. Just as soon as they were signed America started killing them."

With a deficit in our Treasury of $1,700,000,000, with 6,000,000 of our people out of employment, here is the American Senate voting out of that empty Treasury $253,000,000 for people in France who talk like that! It ought to make every American Senator's heart swell with pride when he contemplates that that is the kind of people for whom he is voting such munificent generosity to-day!

That is not all, however. I call attention to our London friends, and I read from the Washington Evening Star an article by Mr. A. C. Gardiner quoting from a London authority. This is London speaking:

There is, of course, a third alternative—simple default and repudiation. Since the debates in Congress, I have heard this solution discussed in the most responsible quarters here as an inevitable consequence of the present mood of Congress.

"The present mood of Congress." Here we are, with starving millions of our own people in our own country, and we voting a quarter of a billion dollars, not out of the Treasury but from money which ought to be in the Treasury today; and this is the way our London friends talk about us. I read further:

The Financial News, in an article entitled "Must Europe Default?" says opinion in Congress is wholly divorced from the facts; that the suspension of war debts must go hand in hand with the suspension of reparations, and that Europe should speak with one voice and the national government here should announce boldly and unequivocally a policy the essence of which is "No reparations, no war debts."

This is the return we get, Senators, for the splendid generosity we have been showering for the last 13 years upon these people, showering upon them money to carry on their wars, money to rehabilitate their countries, money to rehabilitate their businesses, forgiving their war debts entirely, and scaling down the other debts; and this is the way they talk about us when we do not give them everything. I quote further:

The Spectator, equally emphatic, says that if Germany ceases to pay reparations it will be impossible for Britain and France to pay their war debts, especially in view of the fact that America refuses to take payment in goods. The debt question must come to a head with the reparations question. The obverse of the doctrine stated in the Balfour note is that if reparations fail, debt payments fail simultaneously. This represents practically unanimous comment in the British press on the debates in Congress.

Mr. President, we think we are doing something for these people, that we are being charitable toward them. I read from this morning's Washington Post as to France and France's attitude:

French officials frankly expect the International Reparations Conference will grant Germany an extension of the 1-year debt suspension.

In this event, France is considered likely to invoke article 2 of the Mellon-Berenger debt agreement, under which the French war debt to the United States was adjusted.

Article 2 permits France to declare a partial 3-year moratorium on her debt payments to the United States. By giving 90 days' notice France will be able to limit her payments to the United States to $20,000,000 annually.

Why are we passing this moratorium at all? These people are not going to rely on it. Some say they will repudiate it. Some say that they will depend on some other agreement.

Senators, we do ourselves an injustice when we enter into any moratorium or for a moment think of the cancellation of these debts.

Of course, Germany was not our ally in the World War. She was our opponent. She is in a different position from the other nations. She has the right to think as she pleases, to say what she pleases. But some are claiming that this moratorium is in the interest of Germany. Heaven knows I have nothing against Germany. I have sympathy for her in her distressed condition. But here are some selections taken from the German press as to our Nation. I quote:

War has lasted 16 years. German guilt was a lie. The treaty of Versailles is the great crime of modern history. Reparations are tribute. In 1917 America joined the Allies against Germany because then her money was on that side.

Yet Senators here are more interested in the people of Germany than they are in the people of America. I continue the quotation:

Hoover debt plan in 1931 was to protect two billions of American money in Germany, for now America is bound by what Germany owes her to be Germany's political friend.

I read from an article signed by Garet Garrett, the well-known writer, who writes so frequently and so splendidly for the Saturday Evening Post upon international questions.

I have taken these quotations from the press in France and England and Germany to show how little appreciated has been our splendid generosity through all these years and how little appreciated is our proposed generosity now. They do not appreciate it at all. They started out to have all the debts canceled. They have the idea. They will take any means of getting those debts canceled.

While I am talking on that subject I want to digress long enough to pay a tribute to the Kingdom of Italy. I have seen no expression from her press to the effect that she was trying to get out of paying her adjusted debts. On the contrary, I see expressions from Italy's leader, Mr. Mussolini, that he was perfectly willing to pay the debt. He ought to be. All honor to him for thinking that way; but he ought to be willing to pay it, because the Debt Funding Commission scaled down Italy's debt, as my friend across the aisle, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], will testify, to a little over half of the commercial debt, after canceling all the war debt.

Mr. SMOOT. More than half.

Mr. McKELLAR. More than half, he says; but I think it is a little less than that.

Mr. President, of course the moratorium proposal has been much improved by the amendment added to the joint resolution in the House. As some Senators may remember, that amendment is substantially like the one I introduced last week in the Senate, namely, that it is the sense of the Congress that the foreign debts shall not be further canceled. I am very happy that the House put in such a provision. It ought to be strengthened somewhat, but whether strengthened or not, it does evince a purpose upon the part of Congress not to cancel those debts, and that is a splendid purpose.

I want to digress long enough to say that while in the amendment which I proposed it was provided that there should be no further moratorium, I am not so much concerned about it as I was before. Why? I have heard my friends on both sides of the aisle discuss that matter since the Congress reassembled, and I just want to venture the prediction that no other President will ever get a majority of either House, regardless of its politics, to vote by Western Union telegram. I think that is an end to polling the Senate and the House by the President. If that end is accomplished, then America will have received some good from the moratorium.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is expressing approval of the amendment added to the joint resolution by the House, declaring that it shall be the policy of the United States to grant no further extensions or moratoriums in the future. I should like to inquire if the Senator does not think it would be a good idea for the Senate to add a proviso reading as follows:

Provided, That this is no joke.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I thought it would add to its strength, I should be glad to vote for it. But, even with these amendments, I doubt the advisability of approving the moratorium, and I do not intend to vote for it. I realize, of course, the President having notified foreign countries that the moratorium would be granted, that for the Congress not to pass the joint resolution now might be considered by some as indicating that the President and the Congress do not act together in the matter. The answer to this is that no one knew better than the President himself that the Congress had to ratify his action before it could be made good. Not only that, but no one knew better than the countries dealing with him that the Congress would have to approve the moratorium before it would become absolute.

It is true that the President polled the Congress and secured a majority for the moratorium. It is true that notwithstanding how Senators in their hearts and in their minds may feel that they should vote on this question they are now precluded from so voting. They have signed the telegram, and it is binding upon them. But, Mr. President, to my mind this is one of the greatest vices in the transaction.

The President has not the power to postpone or to cancel those debts without calling the Congress together and having his proposal ratified. If the President had the power to postpone, he likewise would have the power to cancel entirely. If he had called the Congress together, in my judgment it would not have indorsed this moratorium. But, be that as it may, I can not in the exercise of my duty as a Senator give my consent to vote in favor of a measure which I think ought not to have been put into effect by the President polling the Congress. It is an assumption of executive authority that does not exist under our Constitution.

Mr. President, I think this last statement can be demonstrated. We have an individual income tax which brought in last year, I will say for illustration, $600,000,000, though I do not know the exact amount, but for the purposes of illustration we will leave it at $600,000,000. Suppose that the plight of those taxpayers had been peculiarly bad last June; would Mr. Hoover have told them not to pay the taxes, and then waited for six months to call Congress together to ratify his action? If he had done so, it would almost have brought on a revolution in this country. Yet in substance this is exactly what has been done in reference to these foreign debts. The taxpayers of this country have already furnished the money to the foreign governments; and when the President refuses to accept payments that are justly due it is precisely like refusing to accept taxes from any other source.

Again, Mr. President, there has been quite a controversy about the disposition of Muscle Shoals. The President takes the view that Muscle Shoals ought to be disposed of to private concerns. Many Members of Congress take the view that it ought to be retained by the Congress for the benefit of all the people. Suppose on the 20th of last June the President had entered into a contract to transfer Muscle Shoals to private concerns on terms that he considered fair and just, and then had polled the Congress to bolster up the illegal act. What would the people of this country have thought about it? There would have been but one opinion.

In my judgment, the only reason why the people of this country have not had more to say about the debt-postponement transaction is because they were not sufficiently familiar with it. At all events, the action of the President with reference to this matter is, in my judgment, without regard to the laws of the land.

I have no desire to speak disrespectfully of the President of the United States; but I want to say in all seriousness that I regret more than I can say his unfortunate action in reference to the moratorium. Under our Constitution the President is the Chief Executive of the Nation. It is his duty to see that the laws of the land are faithfully complied with. It is his duty to execute the laws of the land. Therefore, it seems to me that the President ought to be more scrupulously careful to observe the laws of the land than any other person in the United States.

If there is anyone in the Chamber who disagrees with that proposition, I ask him now to rise in his place and state his disagreement. Of course, no one rises, because we all know that one of the highest functions of the President of the United States is scrupulously to regard and enforce the laws of the land.

Mr. President, in declaring this moratorium without first receiving the approval of the Congress, the President made a mistake, and I hope he will never make another like it. As I said a while ago, I do not believe he ever will, because he will never again, and no other President will ever in our lifetime, get a majority of the Senators and of the Members of the House to indorse a "cat in the bag" like this moratorium was.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator think a vote cast by mail or by telegraph subject to a motion for reconsideration?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether it is subject to reconsideration or not; but I want to say to the Senator from Minnesota that such a vote is unknown to our Constitution and laws. It has never been attempted in the Congress before. If it is a precedent, it establishes a mighty bad precedent; and I hope that no President will ever ask for it again, and that no majority in either House will ever grant it again.

I am constrained to believe that no such mistake will ever be made again. I do not believe the President will ever get a majority of either branch of the Congress hereafter, whatever their politics may be, to give their approval to a measure which has not been first discussed and considered in a constitutional way in each branch of the Congress. If this moratorium has the effect of determining for all time that the President has no authority to poll the Congress, it will be a benefit to our Nation. It would be a tragedy for such a plan of action to become a precedent for the Congress or for the President.

Mr. President, besides this, the whole scheme of the moratorium has been a failure. Germany's largest creditor, of course, is France. As I recall the figures, $260,000,000 has to be paid by Germany to France each year; and those payments are nonpostponable. On the other hand, Germany has obligated herself to pay France $160,000,000 more yearly that is postponable at any time Germany is unable to pay and will give notice. It will be remembered by all, as was so splendidly stated by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] yesterday, that after Mr. Hoover announced the moratorium, France refused to agree to the postponement of the $260,000,000 of nonpostponable debts; Germany, in whose name this moratorium is given, is in essence and in fact paying that $260,000,000 of nonpostponable debts to France to-day.

It is true she has a moratorium for one year as to the payments due Italy, Great Britain, and Belgium, and perhaps smaller payments to other countries, and to that extent Germany has a moratorium; but it will be remembered that shortly after the moratorium was declared the whole economic situation in Germany blew up, and President Hindenburg had to issue orders prohibiting the exportation of gold from Germany to save Germany's economic life. In other words, as we all know, the moratorium has been of practically no benefit to Germany.

Mr. President, in substantiation of the statement just made I want to read from the Rescue of Germany, by Mr. Garet Garrett, pages 10 and 11, as follows:

> The Hoover debt-holiday plan took effect on June 30, and Germany on that date, with $400,000,000 less to pay out and $100,000,000 new credit borrowed at the same time, was $500,000,000 to the good. Nevertheless, within 10 days Doctor Luther, head of the German Reichsbank, was going about Europe in an airplane to Basel, to Paris, to London, saying Germany must have immediately the loan of $500,000,000 more. The whole benefit of the Hoover debt-holiday plan had been swallowed up in the flight from the German mark, and Germany's financial plight was much worse than before. The lesser German sacrifice—that is to say, the total bankruptcy of Germany—now was really imminent.
> International finance was horrified. Where was the end of this? The Germans rushing their own money out of Germany, and Germany at the same time imploring her creditors to put more in to save her and to save themselves.

I read again from another portion of the same work at page 53:

> Take a text from the news as it was printed in the New York Times on Tuesday, June 23, 1931.

That was immediately after the announcement of the moratorium, immediately after the announcement that 68 Senators had agreed to the moratorium. Listen to what the New York Times said:

> Led by New York, tremendous buying enthusiasm swept over the security and commodity markets of the world yesterday in response to week-end developments reflecting the favorable reception of President Hoover's proposal for a 1-year moratorium on war debts and reparations. The world-wide advance in prices added billions of dollars to open-market values, with stocks, bonds, grain, cotton, sugar, silver, and lead in heavy demand. Pronounced strength developed in the German bond list, the amounts ranging from two to 13½ points.

Now, listen to this. This is the way this news item closes. I ask Senators to listen to it.

> United States Government bonds—

Every other bond went up; every other stock went up; every other commodity went up; but what happened to United States Government bonds when it was known that by this method we were giving away the property of the United States?

United States Government bonds failed to participate in the move, all of them closing behind minus signs.

The last line fell obscurely at the end of a paragraph. And that was all the notice anyone bestowed upon the most significant fact of a delirious day—namely, the fact that everything in the world went up with the single exception of United States Government bonds. And why was that? United States Government bonds were telling why, and telling it loudly to such as would listen. They were telling it in the language of quotations, and this is what they were saying:

Again this business of saving Europe with American credit! Do you ever count up what it has cost you already? It is becoming more and more costly; and, besides, you may not be saving Europe at all. You may be only inflating her. Better may turn out to be worse.

Ah, Mr. President, we had already spent for war purposes more than $40,000,000,000 of the money of the taxpayers of America; we had increased our yearly expenditures by more than a billion dollars for our soldiers; we had increased our yearly expenditures over $600,000,000 in order to pay the interest on our bonds; and naturally when it was determined to make a gift to foreign peoples, it was also perfectly natural that our own bonds should go down.

What was the aftermath? Why, after two or three days, as we all remember, the market began to sag, every stock in America began to go down, every bond in America began to go down, every commodity in America began to go down, and they have been going down ever since. There has not been a stock, except temporarily for a moment or two, perhaps for a day, while the gamblers on one side or the other happened to be in control, that has not gone down in price. The general trend of prices has been down every day. Here is what Mr. Garrett says about that on page 57:

We really thought we had done a grand thing; we read every morning in the newspapers that it was a grand thing. The diplomats and the chancelleries of Europe were saying so on typewritten slips or in interviews, and the American correspondents were quoting them to us by cable. But the typewritten words of diplomats and chancelleries are purposefully suave. What people, even the diplomats, were really thinking and saying was very different. The least unpleasant of what the once-allied nations were saying was: "This is the beginning of the end of our hateful war debts to the United States Treasury. Uncle Shylock has been insisting that German reparations have nothing whatever to do with our war debts to America. But now he admits that if we can not collect reparations from Germany neither can we pay our war debts to the United States. That principle is implicit in the debt-holiday plan, since it includes both German reparations and our war debts to the American Treasury in one scheme of relief. Moreover, it is admitted that Germany can not pay reparations unless she can continue to borrow American money to pay them with. So either America must go on lending Germany the money to pay us reparations or cancel our debts to the American Treasury."

Here note that the one fixed point in German foreign policy is to get rid of reparations and that the one unalterable idea in the foreign policy of the former allies—our associates in the war—is to get rid of their debts to the American Treasury.

Mr. Garrett also has this to say about the President's purpose:

The secret of President Hoover's dramatic action in suddenly breaking away from America's settled policy—

I digress there long enough to say that no one has ever been stronger for that policy than has the President—and interfering in the affairs of Europe with his epoch-making proposal for a moratorium for war debts can now be revealed. The hoarding of gold by the United States of America, consequent upon her policy in regard to war debts, brought about a situation in which Wall Street—that is to say, American credit—was threatened with wholesale collapse. America has lent enormous sums to Germany, now on the brink of bankruptcy, and in his effort to save her and his own country, President Hoover electrified the world with his moratorium plan.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The article read by the Senator may be correct when it says that the President "electrified the world." I should like to add that he electrocuted the American taxpayer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; he has sadly hurt him, anyway.

Mr. President, another purpose of the proposed moratorium was to aid economic conditions in America. That was the one principally asserted in this country. Let us see about it.

It will be remembered that Mr. Hoover stated at the time he announced this moratorium that one of its principal objects was that it would be an aid in restoring a better economic condition in America. Prosperity was just around the corner; a very short time it would be right upon us if we agreed to this moratorium. The measure was so heralded throughout the country by the press. The Hoover papers in the Nation pointed with pride to this great measure, which had restored or would restore prosperity to America. But, Mr. President, it will also be remembered that this "prosperity" lasted only for a day or two.

The stock market went up for a day or two. Farm products went up for a day or two. Then they changed and went down and down and down and down, and to-day both the stock and farm-product markets are about as low as they ever have been in our history.

So far as being a benefit to America is concerned, if we judge by the fall of prices in this country, the moratorium has been a great detriment instead of a benefit. The truth is, Mr. President, the moratorium is just a political nostrum. It has not really aided Germany, and has not aided America at all. We all know that to be so; and if there is any Senator on this floor who has a different opinion about it, I yield to him in order to let him tell us what it has done for our country. [A pause.] No Senator seems to accept the challenge, so I will proceed.

LOSS TO AMERICA

Mr. President, instead of being an aid to America, the moratorium just means that our Government threw away $253,000,000. This gift immediately gave rise to the view in all the world that the moratorium was but a forerunner of the cancellation of all foreign debts. America has lost tremendously by reason of this prevailing view.

For years the Republican Party and Mr. Hoover have been saying there would be no cancellation of the debts; and yet, if we judge from Mr. Hoover's recommendation for the reestablishment of the Debt Funding Commission, and if we judge from Mr. Mellon's statement, given out the next day, showing how essential it was that Great Britain's debts be reduced, there can be no doubt but that this moratorium was intended to be just the forerunner of the cancellation of the debts.

I think this was a very great mistake. It was a very unhappy mistake. It was a very unwise proceeding all along the line.

AMERICAN MORATORIUMS NEEDED WORSE

Mr. President, there are a number of needs for this $253,000,000 in America that I think come far ahead of the granting of this enormous dole to our foreign debtors.

There are 6,000,000 people unemployed in this country. I would infinitely prefer to have voted this $253,000,000 to the unemployed in America rather than to give it to European governments with which to raise big armies and build greater navies.

Mr. President, I would much prefer to have given the $253,000,000 to people in America, many of whom are hungry, many of whom are in want, many of whom have not warm clothes, rather than to have appropriated this money for our foreign debtors, who have never asked us for it.

It will be recalled that a year ago, when there was want and destitution in a large section of this country, the President vigorously and successfully opposed aid by Congress to our own destitute people on the ground that such a course would constitute a dole and said that any assistance given to them should come from private sources. The Red Cross thereupon undertook the relief of these needy people—our own people—and set as its goal the sum of $10,000,000. Senators will remember how long a time it took to raise this sum, and for a while it looked as though the drive would fail—in part, at least; but after much difficulty and urgent solicitation the sum was raised. Yet here we are proposing to give away on almost the day before Christmas a sum twenty-five times as great; and we propose by our votes to give it away not to our own people but to the people of foreign countries, and not an official of the government of any foreign country has asked us for this gold.

Mr. President, of course, I sympathize with the German people in their distress; but, Mr. President, I know that there are many American people in distress, and I want to say that I sympathize more with American people who are in this condition than I do with those of any other nation.

If it is necessary to give away this $253,000,000 of the people's money to anybody, it ought to be given to the unemployed people of this country, to the people who are in want in this country, rather than to the people of foreign lands.

In the next place, Mr. President, as much as I am opposed to a dole—and I am opposed to a dole—I would rather give this large sum of money as a dole or a gift to the American people, and especially to the suffering and the needy and the hungry in America, than to give it to the people of foreign nations. Is there any Senator on this floor who takes an opposite view from that expressed in my last statement? If so, I pause long enough to give him time to answer.

We have millions of such people in our country. When I think of our being so charitable as to give $253,000,000 at one time to the peoples of foreign countries, to no good purpose except that we promised to do it by Western Union telegrams, it seems to me that we ought to let this munificent charity begin at home.

In the next place, Mr. President, our farmers are in greater distress than they ever have been in their history, perhaps. In many cases mortgages on their farms are being foreclosed this very day.

There is hardly a day that I do not receive letters from constituents of mine saying, "Oh, Senator, is there not some way by which it can be arranged that my home and my farm on which the Government has a mortgage may be saved? Is there not some way in which a foreclosure may be postponed and my home and farm saved to me and my wife and children so that we may not be turned out of our home?" Can I answer, "Yes; we have $253,000,000 to contribute to the distressed of other lands but not a single dollar to contribute to save the American farmer from the foreclosure of the mortgage on his home and on his farm?"

Their families are being turned out of doors. What matters that? That is a mere local question. This is a great international question. It takes a broad mind to understand great international questions. We must not pay any attention to these purely local questions. They will right themselves. If a man is turned out of his house and out of his farm, let him do the best he can. It will all come out in the wash. Ah! but when it comes to these grave international questions—Germans in distress, Frenchmen in distress, Englishmen in distress, the people of other countries in distress—"Oh, yes; open the Treasury of the United States; let the gold flow out. It makes us broad in our views toward humanity!"

I do not subscribe to that doctrine. So far as I am concerned, I would rather provide in a law to use this $253,000,000 to keep these families of American farmers from being turned out of doors. I would a thousand times rather vote to contribute every dollar of this $253,000,000 to extend these mortgages, to prevent these American farmers from being turned out of doors, than to give it to the people of foreign countries who have never even asked us for it. They boast that they have never asked us for it. The President boasts that it was upon his initiative that this great, munificent gift was made to other people without their asking.

Again, Mr. President, we are told that our railroads are in a peculiarly distressed condition; and they are. I am inclined to think that our railroads have made a mistake in not going out after business in this depression, reducing their rates, and entering into competitive efforts to get business. I think they probably could have benefited themselves if they had done so. Of course, I may be mistaken about this, but such is my belief.

In any event, Mr. President, the railroads of America are to an enormous extent responsible for our good or bad economic conditions; and for that reason I would rather vote to give this $253,000,000 to the railroads of America, and thereby bring about greater employment and greater prosperity in our own country, than vote to give it to the peoples of foreign nations the governments of which have not asked for it.

I am informed that the prospective wage reduction on the railroads alone is something like this figure of $253,000,000. I would rather, any day, turn over this sum to the railroads, or lend it to them, so that they could maintain a proper scale of wages for American workingmen who are now without work and who will be without work, than to give it so generously, unasked, to the people of foreign nations. Our soldiers are needy. We loaned our Allies money after the war, and they paid their soldiers a bonus—a cash bonus. But we only gave our soldiers a promise to pay in 1945. We have since paid half of it. I had rather pay this $253,000,000 to our soldiers than to give it to our European debtors, who do not appreciate it.

Mr. President, I realize that there are two sides to every question. I suppose Mr. Hoover feels that he had good reason for his action. That may be so. I do not want to do him an injustice. It must be remembered that Mr. Hoover is probably the greatest giver-away of other people's money ever known in the history of the world. He first came into public notice during the World War as the giver-away of other people's money to the people of Belgium, which had been almost entirely overrun by Germany at the time. It is true that it has been claimed by some that a great deal of this Belgian relief really helped Germany; but that, I suppose, is disputed, and I shall not go into it.

The American people were led to believe that this money they contributed for Belgian relief was going to the starving Belgians. Enormous sums—I do not think anybody ever knew what sums—went for that purpose and were distributed by Mr. Hoover. After the war was over one of the first acts of Mr. Hoover was to secure a recommendation from President Wilson to have the Congress appropriate another fund of $100,000,000 to be given to the suffering people of Europe. He distributed it.

When people suffer in America Mr. Hoover says it is wrong for the Government to give them relief; it should be a private matter. But, oh, when people suffer in Europe it is a different question. After the war he recommended that the Government reach out and give to them, and he got President Wilson to recommend an appropriation of, $100,000,000, which was distributed by him for their relief; and the American Congress gave the $100,000,000.

It will be noted that in these two matters Mr. Hoover was supreme. He was the great almoner. He was the miracle man in furnishing the money to give to those who applied for it in foreign lands.

In 1922 we find him a member of President Harding's Cabinet; and in the Disarmament Conference of that year America voluntarily gave up 845,000 tons of warships at one time in order to secure the peace of the world, at a cost of over half a billion dollars—not that the ships were dismantled, but they were sent to the bottom of the sea, the greatest war vessels ever constructed on the seas at any time in the world's history. In 1928 there was another Disarmament Conference. Mr. Hoover did not take a prominent part in it, but another part of our Navy was sunk for international purposes, without any benefit to America or to the cause of peace.

Now we come to 1931. Instead of America abounding in riches, we find the greatest depression ever known in our country. We find our National Treasury a billion and a half dollars "in the red." Gifts to other people might be just as popular as ever in some quarters, but the necessities of the case made it more difficult to make these gifts; and so Mr. Hoover comes again as the miracle man to give away other people's money. It was not in the Treasury to be given away, and therefore he stopped our foreign debtors from paying it into the Treasury, and asked the Congress to uphold him; and it looks as if the Congress is going to do it.

I think Mr. Hoover is wrong in all these matters. I think a great many of us suffer from nationalism. Perhaps I do myself, but if I were to criticize Mr. Hoover I should say that I think he is almost too broad in his universal statesmanship; that he covers almost too much territory; that he takes in almost too many people; and that his view of world problems has put him out of harmony with the problems in our own country.

I stop here, Mr. President, long enough to call the Senate's attention, if I may, to a cartoon that appeared in this week's issue of the Saturday Evening Post in which the cartoonist represents a number of ladies discussing international affairs. The chairman of the gathering says, "We can not longer ignore our responsibilities to Europe!" Another one says, "Oh, we must save Germany—poor, downtrodden, stricken Germany!" Another one says, "You are wrong about that! It is all right to give to Germany; we must give to Germany out of our great riches, but remember France first—poor, white, bleeding France! She needs it. Just think what wonderful people they are!" Another one says, "Oh, but we must not forget our own kindred. What about the plight of England? We must give relief to them." Another one says, "Our duty to the Far East is clear. We must act!" All of these are large ladies, according to the cartoon, and away down in one corner is a little individual about half an inch high, marked "Our American problems," who says, "Mamma, ain't I anybody's child anymore?"

We are forgetting our own people in this great crisis. Oh, Senators, let us not do it!

I want to say for Mr. Hoover that of course he thinks of America. I have no doubt about that. I have no doubt that Mr. Hoover would like to have America prosperous and happy; but he—the world statesman, the miracle man in handling the affairs of all countries—thinks of America only as a unit in the great whole, and not as the country in which we should all be most interested. While he is our President, I think he should think more of our Government.

Look at us! Look at our State Department! Look at our Treasury Department, the head of one, the head of both, running all around Europe last year, apparently seeking to give succor to distressed peoples. That was what the papers said. Here we are writing notes every day to Japan, asking her please to keep out of Manchuria. I have no objection to such notes; but, Senators, we have a crisis right here at home. We have 6,000,000 people who are out of work, most of them perhaps hungry, this very hour. They need relief. They need the attention of this Government. They need the attention—and I say it with all due respect—of the President of the United States at this time. We should quit thinking in terms of foreign nations. We should look after the best interests of the American Nation, and we will have our hands full if we will simply do that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I find myself in agreement with the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Tennessee; but as a practical matter I am wondering whether to reject this moratorium, now that it has already run for six months and has only six months more to run, would have any effect in relieving the situation in the United States to which the Senator calls attention.

I may add to the question this observation:

I do not think that either in the moratorium or in any other proposition that may come before us dealing with our relationship with foreign countries we ought to overlook the welfare of our own people; I certainly do not intend to overlook it; but will we not have ample opportunity within the next few weeks to demonstrate our sincerity as well as our capacity to deal with domestic problems, wholly independent of the question of a moratorium?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall take a great deal of pleasure in answering the Senator. I want to say to him that we may have the opportunity, but we have a less capacity by the sum of $253,000,000, to help our people in this country, because but for this moratorium there would be in the Treasury to-day, at this very moment, $253,000,000 that is not there now. Whatever may be our opportunity, we are going to have a difficult time to deal with an empty Treasury. I do not see how we can give relief to our own people with an empty Treasury. We have to bond ourselves and probably sell those bonds at a reduced price in order to do the things that are most needful in our own country.

I want to ask the Senator this: Are there any unemployed in his State? Are there any suffering and starving people in his State?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, there are; and I hope to secure legislation very soon to bring them some relief.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then does not the Senator think that in the use of money now in the Treasury or which may come into the Treasury his first duty is to help the unemployed and the starving and hungry people in his own State and in our own country?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the Senator from Tennessee knows what my answer to that question would be; it would be in the affirmative; and already in this Congress and during the whole of the last session I have sought relief for our own people; and if the postponement of this moratorium or if its rejection by the Senate at this time would put into the Treasury of the United States the $250,000,000 to which he refers, that would be one thing. That might justify the Senator's optimism. But, in my judgment, it would not result in putting a single dime into the Treasury of the United States, because the moratorium is now in effect, regardless of what we may do about it. Our word has been given, and a nation's word ought to be as sacred as that of a private individual or private corporation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. One moment. Will the Senator join me a little later in an effort to give to the American people a moratorium somewhat commensurate with that which we are proposing now to give the nations of Europe? I will specify what I have in mind.

We are now seven years ahead of the lawful schedule in the payment of our own war debt, which is represented, in part, at least, by money which we loaned the allied nations. We have overpaid what the law required us to pay by $3,500,000,000, because in prosperous times we had a surplus in the Treasury of the United States and used that surplus to a premature payment of that much of our own debt. So that if we did not pay on our own war debt a dime for seven years, at the end of that period we would then be where we would have been if we had observed the law in the retirement of our own war obligations.

When the time comes to levy taxes on the American people, will the Senator from Tennessee join me in an effort to suspend the operation of the sinking fund long enough to give our own people a breathing spell, rather than tax them to death in order to fill the deficit in the Treasury, which now exists?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have learned from experience—not of myself, because happily I did not fall into the error, but I have learned from the experience of other Senators in connection with this very measure—that it is not a wise thing to commit oneself to any measure until after it has been explained in this body. Therefore, I am not going to commit myself now.

I want to reply to the Senator's statement. Of course, I would take any reasonable and proper step which might be proposed to relieve our people from the awful condition in which they find themselves to-day—not one class of our people, but all classes of our people. That condition is a monstrous condition, it seems to me, and I think that our charity ought to begin at home.

I think we ought to look after our people first, and not be willing to vote out of the Treasury $253,000,000, and then look to see what scraps we can find in the future for our own people.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. I would vote, and I intend to vote to give relief to our people first; and then later, if we can help other people, I shall be delighted to do so. I do not like to see distress and suffering anywhere, among any people; but I want to say that I conceive it to be my duty to look after the best interests of America first, and then let these matters come when we are able to handle them. If our Treasury were full it might not make so much difference; but being $1,700,000,000 "in the red" to-day, I think we ought to be very careful about voting money to foreign people under these circumstances.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator does not desire nor intend to put me in the attitude which his language might imply, of being willing to vote $250,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States, because it is not there to begin with, and the Senator just admitted it was not there. This resolution does not take any money out of the Treasury. It simply gives our debtors a suspension of one year in paying money they can not now pay.

If a vote to reject this moratorium six months after it began to operate, and six months prior to its expiration next June, would put $1 of this $250,000,000 in the Treasury, it would be an entirely different proposition. But the money is not there, and it is not going to be put there, regardless of our action on this joint resolution granting 12 months' moratorium to the nations of Europe.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have no doubt that if this moratorium were defeated this day it would not be 30 days before every dollar of the $253,000,000 would be paid into our Treasury. I have no idea that the great Republic of France would violate its obligation and treat its bonds as scraps of paper. I know that Great Britain, the people of whose country have the same blood we have, would not go back on their obligation. I do not believe the people of Italy would go back on their obligation, or that the people of Belgium would go back on their obligation, or that the people of any other of the nations would go back on their obligations. So far as I know, the only countries which are making a fight about the matter, or contending for cancellation, are France and Great Britain. The others are perfectly willing to pay. They wanted to pay, and there is even now a dispute in the country as to whether or not they had the money on hand in New York to pay on the 15th of December, when the installment was due.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no desire to prolong a controversy with the Senator, but does not the Senator know that if we were to reject this joint resolution granting a 12-month moratorium each of the debtor nations could, under the terms of their contracts with us, ask for a 2-year moratorium, and that we would be compelled to grant it?

Mr. McKELLAR. No, Mr. President; I do not know that that would be the fact at all. I have examined the contracts existing between the debtor nations and the United States. I think I am fully familiar with all of those contracts. They are contained in what is known as the Debt Funding Commission laws. Some of the nations have a right to ask for a 3-year postponement and one a 2-year postponement of the principal of their debts. But the Senator will recall that the principal forms only a small portion of the debts actually due every six months during these first years of the contract. So, under the moratoriums they would have a right to ask for, the payments from which they would be excused would not be as large—probably not one-fifth as large—as that provided for in this joint resolution.

If the moratorium which they might demand would be better for France and for England and for other nations, why this moratorium? If they have now a right to demand a moratorium which would be better, why not stand by the agreement?

I want to say to the Senator from Kentucky that whenever America makes an agreement, as one representative I am perfectly willing to stand by it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment; I will yield in a moment.

The Senator says that if he thought that by voting against this joint resolution and defeating it this $253,000,000 could be brought into the Treasury, he would be against the joint resolution. I want to say that in my humble judgment if we served notice on the world that we were not going to have any moratorium, this one or any other, that we were not going to have any debt cancellation, the European powers would pay up, and continue to pay up, in accordance with the contracts which now exist between us.

Why do I say that? No great nation like Great Britain, which I admire extravagantly; no great nation like France, which I admire extravagantly; no great nation like Italy, which I admire; or like Belgium, or like the other nations which owe us money, is going to violate its agreement. They are going to pay. Their credit would be forever impaired unless they paid.

I call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the fact that not one of those nations has asked that this moratorium be declared. They have not asked for any postponement of the payment of the debt. It is the President of the United States who initiated the whole thing.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not heard of any of them that object to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will do Mr. Mussolini the credit of having given out a public statement, after the moratorium was announced, to the effect that Italy had the money, and was perfectly willing to pay the installment she had agreed to pay. So far as I know, and so far as I believe, every single nation would pay.

If the Senator were to join us, and if the Senate could vote as I believe it desires to vote, and defeat this moratorium joint resolution, that would be the end of cancellation. It would do away with it for good, and the result would be that these countries would be better off, and so would America.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The distinguished Senator from Kentucky has just indicated that if he could be assured that if this moratorium could be defeated we would get a single dollar into the Treasury he might vote for it.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is that a correct assumption?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not make that statement or intend to leave such implication.

Mr. McKELLAR. I misunderstood the Senator, too, then, because I thought that was what he said.

Mr. BARKLEY. I said that if there were any assurance that the $250,000,000 would be put in the Treasury by the rejection of this moratorium joint resolution that would be one thing, and might be a persuasive argument against the moratorium; but I did not indicate by that that I would vote against it. Of course, no one can give such assurance.

Mr. McKELLAR. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BARKELY. I will say to the Senator while I am on my feet that I am one of those who replied to the President of the United States that I would vote for the necessary legislation in view of the facts which I had in my possession at that time. In common with all of you, I had to act on the facts then before me. Regardless of what may have developed since then, I regard myself as having promised to vote for this joint resolution, and I would rather the people of my State would say I made an egregious mistake in doing that than to have they say I would not keep my word to the President of the United States when I have given it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say to the Senator that I indorse the statement he has just made. I think the Senator made a mistake in sending that telegram; but I think the Senator is exactly right, after having sent it, in abiding by it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me further?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The statement was made on yesterday, and not challenged, that one of the debtor nations has now on deposit in banks in America the sum that nation owes the United States and is ready to make payment in the event this joint resolution shall be defeated. That statement has not been denied; so we would at least get that sum transferred to the Federal Treasury.

Mr. McKELLAR. What nation was that?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It was stated by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] that that nation was Greece.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; that is true.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Just one further statement, if the Senator will yield further.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I have in my hand a signed news story of recent date over the signature of Carrol J. T. Horan. I will refer to one paragraph in this signed statement, with the permission of the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The statement reads:

> The Italian ambassador called on the State Department on Saturday to announce that the Italian Government had already deposited with the fiscal agents of the Italian Government in New York the necessary funds to cover the Italian debt payments. Similar action had already been taken by Sir Ronald Lindsay, the British ambassador, and the French ambassador, Paul Claudel, who were in a quandary as to how to advise their Governments.

Mr. McKELLAR. I believe those proposals to pay were declined with thanks, were they not?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am not advised as to the diplomatic language used between the respective parties.

Mr. McKELLAR. There was some more kindly diplomatic language used, but that was the substance of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know, of course, what the real facts are; but, in that connection, I may say that we have had before the Finance Committee during the last few days those who represented Great Britain and some of the other nations in the negotiation and sale of their government obligations. By presumption they would, of course, be the fiscal agents for the deposit of any money intended to go toward the payment of a debt due to the United States; and those gentlemen testified before the Finance Committee that there had been no such deposit made with them, and they knew of no other fiscal agents in the United States with whom such deposits had been made.

Whether it be possible that some nation, in order to avoid the technicality of being in default on the day when the payment was due, obtained the money to deposit it in some financial institution in this country, not expecting to have to pay the amount at present, I do not know. It is entirely possible that such an occurrence transpired. As a matter of fact, if they did not pay the obligation on the 15th day of December they would be technically in default, and no nation likes to be even technically in default on a payment. It is entirely possible that in order to avoid that technicality money was obtained from some source and deposited in this country so that it might be said to be ready if payment was demanded.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to have that explanation from the Senator from Kentucky. That was the wording of the administration's statement, that those nations would not be considered technically in default by not having paid those amounts when due. My recollection is, from the newspaper accounts solely—because I am not a member of the Finance Committee and was not present at the hearings—that the financial agents of Great Britain said that if Great Britain had drawn on them the draft would have been paid.

Mr. President, I have finished, with one exception, what I desire to say.

Some years ago a man by the name of William G. McAdoo was our Secretary of the Treasury. I remember that in 1914 it was thought by some people we were going to have a financial crisis in the country. Those of us who were in the Senate or the House at the time remember the celebrated McAdoo crop-moving order, when the New York banks got together and were believed to be preparing for a financial crisis. Mr. McAdoo advised them that he would issue $500,000,000 of currency under the Vreeland Act and that he would also take Government deposits away from New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and Boston banks and put them in the country banks for the purpose of moving the crops of the country. After this forceful statement it will be remembered that the depression went by the board and we had no financial crisis that year.

I wish we had had Mr. McAdoo at the head of the Treasury in October, 1929, when the present panic came. I believe our situation would have been better than it is now. He made a really great Secretary of the Treasury.

Permit me to digress long enough to say that, though I am his great admirer and friend, I am not for Mr. McAdoo for President. I am for Franklin D. Roosevelt as the Democratic candidate for President of the United States, and I think he is going to be the next President of the United States. I merely say this in connection with what I am going to say about Mr. McAdoo. Mr. McAdoo made a wonderful Secretary of the Treasury. He conducted the finances of the country in the interest of the American people. His views are entitled to weight.

I make the statement for the purpose of reading from page 424 of his recent book. It forms one of the most cogent reasons against the moratorium and against any further cancellation of the debts that could possibly be stated. Mr. McAdoo was and is an able and splendid man. He was a most forceful official. Above all, he was not afraid. I read:

> On the other hand, the Liberty bonds which furnished the money to the Allies are still outstanding. They constitute a charge against the whole people. They will have to be paid, and they will be paid, both principal and interest, regardless of what happens to the foreign loans, because the United States is, and always has been, jealous of its honor. Cancel these foreign debts, and the result will be that Mr. Everyman and his wife and his children, in proportion to their means, will have to pay the colossal sum that the war profiteers have already put in their pockets.

Ah, Mr. President! I wish we had such a man at the helm of our finances now. He was a man who believed in the people, who believed in America, who was willing to be charitable at all times to foreign countries whenever we could, but who looked first after the interests of America. I want to say that Mr. McAdoo is exactly right when he says that Congress can grant the moratorium and thus enter the first wedge for the cancellation of our foreign debts, or it can cancel the debts in part, or can cancel them in whole; but the money which those foreign debts represented was collected from the American people through Liberty bond issues and Victory bond issues, and that money the American people are going to pay, and pay according to the bond.

Mr. President, I do not see how we can stand on the floor of this body and vote for a measure that will take $253,000,000 in debts in one year off the backs of the people abroad who borrowed it, the foreign taxpayers for whose use it was spent, and put that amount of taxation on the backs of the American taxpayers.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree absolutely with what the Senator said with reference to cancellation or reduction. I would not vote for cancellation of the European debts to this country. I would not vote for any further reduction, because to that extent it would mean cancellation. But does not the Senator know that if a mere postponement of the debts we ourselves owe were regarded as cancellation, all of us would be out of debt in the United States now?

Mr. McKELLAR. No, Mr. President; I do not know that. I believe this moratorium is but the entering wedge for further cancellations.

I want to say further to the Senator something with reference to what the moratorium means. It means exactly the same thing as if the next interest day of American bonds Mr. Mellon would come out with a statement that he did not have the money to pay the interest on those bonds, and that the interest would not be paid. What would happen to those bonds? We know what would happen to them. They would go below par. Why? Because there would be a belief engendered in the mind of every holder of those bonds that they were not going to be paid according to their tenor and effect. When we give this moratorium there will be engendered in the minds of our European debtors generally the idea that we are not going to insist on payment.

When we grant this moratorium everyone in this body knows—and I do not believe there is a man here who does not know it—that the whole intention is to form an entering wedge to the further cancellation of the foreign debts. So far as I am concerned, I am absolutely and wholly unwilling to take any step even looking to a further cancellation or reduction of those debts. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] says the moratorium does not mean that. If it does not mean that, why is the President sending a message here asking us to reestablish the War Debt Funding Commission? Why is the Secretary of the Treasury making a bold argument, and sending it out the very next day, saying that Great Britain was unable to pay, and that her debts ought to be reduced?

We know what it means. We know what the purpose is. We know that it is the purpose of those in charge of our financial affairs that if it can be arranged there will be a further reduction of the obligations now due us. Mind you, they were not for war purposes. We have canceled the war debts. These are commercial debts, made for the purpose of rehabilitating those countries—those countries who think of us as revealed by the articles to which I have called attention to-day.

Mr. President, I regret that I have taken so much time. I want to thank Senators for having listened to me so patiently. I apologize. My only excuse for having taken so long the other day and to-day is that I deeply feel the importance and seriousness of the situation. I believe in our great Republic. I want to help her; and then, if we have anything left after helping our own people, I will be happy to join with the internationalists in seeing what we can do for the afflicted and distressed of other lands. But so long as I know myself I shall vote against any measure that puts America in second place to any other nation under the sun.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, it is quite evident that it is not expected that any vote will be changed by this debate. I find no fault with those Senators who have pledged their votes to this measure if they can square that with their conception of their constitutional duty. They tell us why they did so. They tell us that they were told that this measure would save the world from economic collapse. They tell us that they were told that it would stop the depression in the United States. They tell us that they were told it would save Germany from political collapse. When they were told that, I am sure they believed it was so or they would not have pledged their votes. But in my opinion they should have waited until all the evidence was in before rendering a decision. It must be evident to everyone now that the bases upon which they cast their votes were not founded on the facts.

The world has not been saved from political or economic collapse, nor has the depression been stopped in the United States, nor has Germany been saved from the economic and social and political consequences which exist in that country to-day due to the fact that the World War has never ceased, due to the fact that through the treaty of Versailles an economic war has been conducted against Germany ever since the World War ceased.

If I believed that the world depression and Germany's economic collapse had been stopped by voting $250,000,000 out of the United States Treasury, I would myself so vote. However, I have the belief that those things are due to causes of far deeper moment. Those conditions are due to causes that go far deeper than can be cured by simply spending $250,000,000 of the United States taxpayers' money to buy, for the period of one year, the allied European governments off of the back of Germany. That is what it amounts to, so far as I can see.

The President in his message states that the moratorium has nothing to do with the cancellation of debts, but at the same time he states that he wants the debt-funding commission re-created. The President says also that the moratorium has nothing to do with reparations. It has something to do with reparations in this respect, that it ties up the money that certain countries of Europe owe us for amounts loaned, mostly after the war, with reparations; and that is something they have tried to accomplish ever since the treaty of peace was signed. The Government of the United States has never consented to such a connection between the so-called allied debts and reparations. Those debts are based on entirely different grounds. The reparations were an indemnity assessed upon Germany for having been the sole cause of the World War. Everyone now knows that that decision and that indemnity were based upon an untruth. Germany certainly was not the sole Government or country responsible for the World War.

The debts of the Allies to us are based upon loans made to them for the purpose of rehabilitating their industries, to buy food for their people, to put them on their feet, and save them from chaos after the World War was over. If the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States desire to do something to save this country from depression, and to save Germany and Europe from political, social, and economic collapse, I would advise them to explore much deeper into the causes of the present condition than has been done by those who sponsor this joint resolution.

How far could $250,000,000 go toward saving Europe from economic collapse? I have here a compilation showing the sums spent by the various countries of Europe for armaments and the amounts they have spent in payment of the interest on their debts to the United States in 1930.

In that year Belgium spent for armaments $23,247,000 and paid to the United States as interest on her debt $7,950,000. She spent about two and one-half times more for armaments than she paid the United States on account of interest.

Czechoslovakia spent, in round numbers, $41,000,000 in 1930 for armaments and spent $3,000,000 in the payment of interest to the Government of the United States on her debt.

France spent $547,000,000 for armaments in 1930 and expended $50,000,000 on her debt to the United States.

Great Britain spent $608,000,000 in 1930 for armaments and expended $159,000,000 to the United States on her debt.

Poland spent $122,000,000 on armaments and $7,000,000 to the United States in interest on her debt.

Italy spent $322,000,000 for armaments in 1930 and expended about $14,000,000 in the payment of interest on her debt to the United States.

So, in spite of all so-called peace treaties, the Locarno treaty, the Briand-Kellogg pact, the League of Nations, and the 9-power treaty, the nations of Europe are spending seven times more for future wars than they have paid to the United States on the honest debt they owe to us. And what they have paid us for interest was borrowed here. If those nations would cut their military armaments or their military expenditures by one-seventh, they could pay all their debts. As a matter of fact, what they pay to the United States amounts, generally speaking, to less than one-half per cent of their national incomes, less than 3 per cent of their annual budgets, and less than one-seventh of what they spend for armaments each year.

The moratorium agreement was not proposed because they could not pay. Certainly Germany could not pay reparations; and the moratorium will not make Germany able to pay reparations. It will not change the status of the reparations, because Germany could not have paid anyway; so how will it help Germany?

The moratorium was proclaimed on June 20 and was agreed to on July 6. The banks of Germany did not start to close until long after the moratorium had been agreed to. As a matter of fact, the run on the banks of Germany increased in intensity and force after the moratorium had been proclaimed. By July 20 most of the banks in Germany had closed because of that run not only by the people of Germany but by foreign bankers having credits in Germany.

Those bankers did what private investors or private depositors do, and for which bankers criticise the individual depositor. Foreign bankers who had credits in Germany started a run or increased the run that had already been started on the banks of Germany. As a matter of fact, bankers are peculiar; they are like a man who will lend one an umbrella when the sun is shining, but when it begins to look like rain will ask for its return. So they called every cent that they could get out of Germany until they could get no more. Then the German Government was forced to take such drastic steps to prohibit the flight of gold from Germany that, in fact, a dictatorship was inaugurated in Germany, and very heavy penalties were imposed upon people who endeavored to remove capital from Germany. That is what stopped the run on the banks of Germany and made it possible to reopen them.

Mr. President, this moratorium is only one step, and I hope the last, in the very interesting and subtle intrigue that has been going on in our foreign relations for the past 15 years. We have sponsored a financial policy that always starts out as a private business transaction. The distinguished banker from New York who testified before the Finance Committee day before yesterday said that he was trying to build up a psychology for the people of this country.

First, we had the so-called Dawes plan. When the governments to which Germany was to pay reparations found that Germany could not pay what they thought was sufficient, they entered upon another program. Germany paid all she could; but those to whom she paid reparations wanted more. They could not get it out of Germany, and so they got together and organized the so-called Dawes Commission which furnished the world with the Dawes plan by which whatever reparations Germany could not pay out of the profits of her industry and through taxation she would be able to pay out of funds that could be borrowed in other countries; and to make it semiofficial, so far as the Government of the United States was concerned, there was made chairman of that committee a man who was in that year the Republican candidate for Vice President of the United States.

Under the authority of that plan bonds were issued, underwritten by bankers, and sold for a commission to the people of the United States, the people of Holland, and the people of other countries, but particularly the people of the United States. When the creditors of Germany collected as much as they could under that plan, then came the Young plan, with another American as chairman. This time a Democrat was selected in order to make the scheme nonpartisan or bipartisan. Under that plan bankers again underwrote the bonds of Germany for a commission, peddled them throughout the country under high-pressure salesmanship methods to investors, got the money, turned it over to Germany, and Germany paid her reparations. The reparations were payable in gold, and the gold went to those who received the reparations, and certainly a good time was had by all so long as it lasted.

Now people have found fault and editorials have been written finding fault with Germany for borrowing this money. I believe—and I think the estimate has been verified—that something like $4,000,000,000 were thus borrowed. But these same people who put this paper in the hands of investors and banks of the United States underwrote and peddled out seventy billions of American paper to the people of the United States in the last 10 years, from 1920 to 1930. So when it comes to spending borrowed money, with everything that has been said about Germany, Germany is a "piker" compared to the municipalities and States and people of the United States when it comes to spending borrowed money raised through bonds and stocks.

When the stock-market crash in 1929 came they could not sell any more bonds here. People had lost their money and were getting suspicious, and the racket was not so good as it had been in the previous 10 years, so what did these people do? They took the depositors' money in the banks and sent it to Europe as short-term credits to get a rate of interest of 7 or 8 per cent.

When I was a boy I asked a banker what was the most important thing to know in a bank. He said, "The most important thing to know in a bank is to know the difference between short and long term credits." These bankers did not even know that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact, however, that European countries, including Germany, or German citizens, in order to obtain the high rate of call money on the New York Stock Exchange, loaned from time to time approximately a billion dollars in the United States? Of course, it was call money and could be withdrawn at a moment's notice. So that while Americans were guilty of the wrong—if we may call it a wrong—of loaning enormous sums for the purpose of adding to the orgy of stock speculation, many of our European friends, anxious to get this high rate of interest, loaned their funds here. Perhaps money that we had loaned to Europe came back again and was loaned upon the Stock Exchange.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am informed that a great deal of that was done in 1928 and 1929.

Lord Beaverbrook is quoted on August 19 as saying, in regard to these American and British short-term credits, which were bank deposits, transferred to Europe:

> No man could conceive that such huge figures could have been reached. They were a revelation to the world. It is fortunate for Great Britain that New York is more heavily involved than we.

Eight hundred million dollars of the American people's bank deposits were transferred to Europe as short-term credits, and what happened to Germany is what happened to us. It was not only in Germany that they had had bank collapses and bank failures. We had them here. We had them all over the world. But it was not Germany's fault. Lord Beaverbrook continued:

> The great question in Great Britain is whether or not the Government will pledge the national credit to restore the German situation.

For the benefit of Germany, or for the benefit of English bankers who had reloaned other people's funds in Germany? Of course, the British Parliament was called in extra session to deal with the situation in order to throw the governmental credit back of the banks of London. The American Congress should have been called into session if it was found necessary to throw the credit of the Government of the United States back of the New York banks that had $800,000,000 on short-term loans in Germany.

When we bear these things in mind, the contradictions that surround this joint resolution cease to be so mysterious.

It is true that if this joint resolution is defeated—which it will not be—that will not put back a dollar into the Treasury of the United States; but I want to protest against this procedure. I object to New York bankers playing European politics with American bank funds and then making the taxpayer pay their losses.

I find in a paper of to-day a quotation from French papers pointing out that under the Mellon-Berenger agreement, France, if she will give notice three months before June 16, 1932, can get another extension of this moratorium.

I find here a paragraph that is intersting, and the mystery of it lends itself very well to the mystery that surrounds this joint resolution. It says:

France may use the provisions of the Mellon-Berenger debt agreement for a partial 3-year moratorium on her debt payments to the United States if the Hoover moratorium is extended.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I assume that the Senator knows that a provision of that character is in each and every—all of the written agreements entered into between us and the debtor nations. That provision is there.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I have just finished reading it. I have it here.

France can save $30,000,000 in payments to America next year under article 2 of the agreement, which provides that by giving 90 days' notice she will pay the United States only $20,000,000 annually. The 1932 scheduled payments total $50,000,000.

Then the article continues, saying:

The French expect that the reparations conference to follow the report of the advisory committee of the Young plan, meeting at Basel, will grant Germany an extension of the Hoover moratorium. In this case, France is considered likely to invoke article 2 of the Mellon-Berenger agreement.

It is expected that—the reparations conference to follow the report of the advisory committee of the Young plan meeting * * * will grant Germany an extension of the Hoover moratorium.

By what authority they expect to grant an extension of the moratorium I should like to be informed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that I understand the point the Senator has just made. Of course, France could not, by granting a moratorium to Germany upon the latter's request, affect any contract between the United States and Germany. Does the Senator imply from what he has read, or does he draw the deduction from what he has read, that France seeks to modify in any way the contract which was entered into between the United States and Germany?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. This is a quotation from a French paper. It states, or implies, that this reparations conference has the power to grant to Germany an extension of the Hoover moratorium.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will still pardon me, if the contract were a multiform contract, if it were between all of the debtor countries instead of the United States and Germany, or the United States and France separately, or the United States and Great Britain separately, then, obviously, all the other nations, if they should agree, could not modify the contract between the United States and Germany; and I do not understand that the council at Basle could enter into any arrangements or negotiations which would interfere with the contract which has been made between the United States and Germany.

I was wondering if the Senator meant to convey the idea that any action that might be taken by this conference at Basel, or taken by France or the other nations acting jointly or separately, could interfere with the contract which we have with Germany.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator mean whether they would have a right to end that contract?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I give it to the Senator as a quotation from the French press, for what it is worth.

Mr. KING. Of course, if the language in all of the contracts were the same, and the provisions were the same—namely, that upon the request of Germany a moratorium might be obtained from one and all of the allied nations—then, if she made the request upon all, if the contract were lived up to, the moratorium would be granted by all of the nations to Germany. But if the contracts are separate, bilateral instead of multilateral, then one nation or two nations could not affect the contracts as between the other nations.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I had not intended to discuss that. I gave it as I got it from the Washington News, as a quotation from a French paper. Usually the French know what they are talking about in affairs of diplomacy and international relations.

Mr. KING. And finance.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I called attention to the practice here in the United States of these extralegal, unofficial commissions that, sometimes surreptitiously, sometimes overtly, have been traveling to Europe for the purpose of engaging in financial deals with the Governments of Europe. When they go, we are always told that it is none of the Government's business; that it is a private transaction, with which the Government of the United States has no concern. We always find, when they become heavily involved, that they cease to be unofficial and become official; and then the Government of the United States is asked to underwrite and spend the taxpayers' money to pay the losses.

Before we got into the World War banks in this country were financing, for a commission, war purchases in this country; and we have it on the authority of the then Assistant Secretary of the United States Treasury that when we went into the war, there were $800,000,000 in war contracts that foreign governments could not pay, and we paid them. We have it also on the same authority that in one of the banks of the United States one foreign government had overdrawn its bank account $400,000,000, and could not pay; and the first thing we did after war was declared was to draw a check upon the Federal Treasury to pay the deficit.

These transactions always start out as private business transactions, whether they be war purchases, whether they be flotations of bond issues, or whether they be questions of frozen American bank depositors' credits, frozen in Europe. If the people who handle these transactions have enough influence and power, as they usually do, they sooner or later obtain action by the Government of the United States to pay their losses.

If we are going to assess the taxpayers of the United States to pay for the losses resulting from the guaranty of bank deposits in Europe, by the same token we ought to ask them to pay the losses of American depositors in "busted" banks in the United States. If we are to start out upon such an ambitious program as to save Europe from the apparent coming conflict and possible collapse, and save the impending crash in the United States, we shall have to do something else than just take $250,000,000 out of the American taxpayer's pocket and hand it over to some one else. It can not be done in that way.

I do not find fault with anyone who thought it could be done that way. We have spent $40,000,000,000 in the last 15 years to save and build up Europe, and I think we have done a very poor job of it. I think economic salvation, like charity, should begin at home.

There is a greater deficit in the Treasury of the United States than in that of any other government in the world. We have more people out of employment here than are out of employment in any other nation in the world, and I think there are more bankruptcies and more foreclosures of mortgages in this country than in any other country in the world.

If we are to get to the root of this European trouble, the President of the United States will use the power vested in him, and I am sure the Congress will be glad to follow him in calling an international conference of all the nations of the world who owe us money to revise the treaty of Versailles and the treaty of Berlin, to get away from the curse of the last war and stop the war from continuing, as it has done, upon the economic ground on which the war has been fought since 1918.

There can not be peace unless the causes of war are removed. The treaty of Versailles is an instrument of war, has been used for war purposes, and that war is still going on, always with a possible military war in the background, and for every cent of credit we have released to European Governments, to that extent new credits have been released for the building of armaments in Europe. As a matter of fact, as a result of the debt settlements we made, American taxpayers are now paying for the armies and the navies of Europe.

It is useless to talk of peace, either political peace or economic peace or stability of international commerce, so long as we still are laboring under the psychology of war as it is still operating through the treaty of Versailles and the treaty of Berlin.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the pending measure (H. J. Res. 147) proposes to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932. The proposal, in effect, is a relief measure for certain countries and peoples of Europe.

Upon the second day of this session the President advised us as follows:

> Upon the initiative of this Government a year's postponement of reparations and other intergovernmental debts was brought about.

In so far as our Government is concerned the debts were due December 15. The payments were not made; hence, as suggested by the President, the postponement is already an accomplished fact.

While the President and others are devoting their attention to and bestowing their blessings upon foreign lands and peoples, and extending the payment of their debts at the expense of the Federal Treasury and the taxpayers of America, I will postpone the final vote only long enough to call attention to the distress among the peoples within the borders of our own country.

Recent issues of widely read publications carry full-page semiofficial statements advertising to the world the condition and suffering of our people. I exhibit to the Senate such an advertisement. The statement is sponsored by the President's Organization on Unemployment Relief and by the Committee on Mobilization of Relief Resources.

Mr. President, what is the condition to-day among the people of the country? The advertisement answers the question. I read:

> Men are out of work. Our men. Our neighbors. Our citizens. Honest, hard-working folk.

Let me add, they are your constituents and mine, men who support the Government in times of peace, and men who defend it in times of war.

Again I read:

> They want jobs. They're eager to work. But there aren't jobs enough to go 'round. Somebody's got to tide them over.
> Who's going to do it?

Mr. President, who is going to do it? This question is tormenting the minds of millions of our people at this very hour. If organized society—local, State, or National—does not solve the riddle, then distress will organize, and the highest human law, the law of self-preservation, will be invoked, and the people themselves will provide the answer.

The President advises us that he is "opposed to any direct or indirect Government dole," yet he reports, apparently with approval, that distress is being relieved by city, county, State, and charity doles.

What is the difference between a city, county, or State dole and a National dole? In so far as the cost is concerned and in respect to the effect upon the morale of the recipient what is the difference between a charity dole and a Government dole?

Mr. President, this suggests the query, What is the function of government? In thousands of years of recorded history this question has never been answered satisfactorily. Every official act of every government attempts in an affirmative way to answer in part this question: What is the function of our Government?

The Declaration of Independence suggests an answer:

> Governments are instituted among men to secure life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

The Constitution itself suggests an answer:

> To promote the general welfare of the people of the United States.

Under the general-welfare clause our Government has the power to help those in distress.

What is the picture to-day?

We see America, the richest, strongest, and most influential Nation of the earth; we see vast surpluses of raw and manufactured products; we see 500,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat; we see 24,000,000 bales of cotton to be disposed of; we see $60,000,000,000 of frozen credits in the bank vaults of America.

Reverse the picture; look on the other side.

We see 6,000,000 unemployed—representing 30,000,000 American citizens—men, women, and children, without income and without means of support.

We see another 30,000,000 men, women, and children engaged in agriculture, with ample food and produce, but without money, taxes unpaid, interest defaulted, and foreclosures completed and pending.

These two groups embrace one-half the total population of the States.

What have the conditions portrayed produced?

On every hand we see silent factories, smokeless chimneys, and empty dinner pails. We see abandoned farms, empty buildings, and a restless people. We see failures, bankruptcies, insanity, and suicide.

What is being done to either avert or relieve this pending and growing disaster?

The administration plan is for each community to solve its own problems and provide for its own distressed. If this plan fails, if communities do not provide bread and soup and flop houses, then what may happen?

The pages of history are red with answers.

Insufficiently clothed and undernourished bodies are unable to resist the cries of children for bread.

To the suggestion that propertyless, jobless, and hungry people care for themselves, let me, in the name of the inarticulate millions, suggest that if the favored and privileged few insist on owning all the property, doing all the work, and garnering all the profits, then they must prepare to pay all the taxes, provide jobs for, and feed and clothe the people of America.

No one has asserted or can assert that the Government is not able to provide relief for our own people. A Government so impoverished as to be impotent is already dead. A Government that, while being literally crushed by the weight of its own gold, its own food supplies, and its own manufactured products, refuses to go to the rescue of its own people, does not deserve to live, and if the inattention is prolonged, such Government will not long survive.

The President advises us that the economic depression is world-wide and that already the governments of 19 countries, embracing more than half the population of the world, are either tottering or have already fallen.

On yesterday the Associated Press was responsible for the statement that:

> In one way or another administrations were overturned in 23 countries across the world in 1931.

Our people are patient, yet they are human.

Under our system of government our people do not and should not have to resort to force to bring about a change.

Already the people, using their legal weapon—the ballot—have waged and are waging successful revolution on every political battlefield.

Mr. President, the people have won at home; are they to lose here in Washington?

Why is it that a proposal to tax Americans to help foreigners takes form even before the Congress convenes, and then, with a political battering ram, is driven through in double shifts extending even into the nighttime?

Can this be due to the soothing influence of Washington, the Capital of the Nation, the richest Government of the earth?

What is the picture here?

Washington, a city of 600,000 people, having a local annual budget of some $50,000,000, having some 75,000 Federal employees drawing annual salaries totaling more than $150,000,000; and with a local Federal housing program under way costing $125,000,000 additional, with each dollar having an enhanced buying power—Washington is to-day the most prosperous city not only in America but in the world.

The head, leaders, and advisers of the administration are men far removed from want. They neither come in contact with, see, nor even hear of the real suffering and anguish existing among the people.

But have we, who have just come from the homes of our people, already forgotten the scenes we left only a few days ago?

Time alone will answer this question.

Mr. President, I admit the Seventy-second Congress is new. In the Senate the party of the administration has not perfected its organization. Yet in these few days the issues are clarifying and the forces are assembling.

The program recommended, submitted, and pending before us will help those for whom it was intended, but it fails to reach those most in need.

The proposal at issue, the moratorium, will help only peoples across the sea.

Decreased appropriations will add recruits to the army of the unemployed.

Increased taxes of the kind proposed will take clothing from the backs and food from the mouths of the masses of the people.

Federal aid for the banks, industry, and the railways is not sufficient, in that it will not reach those who must have assistance.

Repeal or even revision of the antitrust laws is in the interest of combinations and mergers and leads only to monopoly.

Mr. President, we have now traveled for more than two years in the mist and maze of uncertainty. We have had to feel our way along.

During the last winter we were informed that if the Congress would adjourn and go home the captains of industry would work out our salvation and bring back our lost prosperity. The Constitution adjourned the Congress on March 4, but conditions did not improve. Instead, they grew steadily worse. In my section of the country we were blessed with bountiful crops, yet the market price was far below the cost of production. Wheat sold for less than 25 cents per bushel, cotton sold for less than 6 cents per pound, and oil sold for less than 10 cents per barrel.

Mr. President, we can not live under such conditions. We have come to the forks of the road. The highway over which we are invited to travel is a continuation of the path of liquidation, and deflation, and can lead only to stagnation, collapse, and chaos.

From the standpoint of the great masses of the people, the wage earners, the farmers, business men of low and high estate—in fact, from the standpoint of all our people save the life-salaried class and the holders of fixed investments—we can not in safety follow further the policy that has been pursued.

The time has come which demands and justifies frankness.

The total massed debts of the people are to-day more than $150,000,000,000. America, as we term the United States, under the existing financial policy can not be liquidated. I know some of the facts, but it would be neither appropriate nor helpful to state them here.

Because of deflation—the removal of more than $2,000,000,000 from circulation—the value of the circulation remaining, only some four and one-half billion dollars, mounted upward and the value of all classes of property vaulted downward, until to-day all the property of the country could not be sold for a sum sufficient to retire the massed obligations of the people.

For millions of our people liquidation has run its course. Positions are being vacated, employees are being discharged, wages are being cut, incomes are diminishing, holders of industrial notes and bonds are not getting interest, and, in addition, they are gradually learning that their securities have lost much if not all their former value.

The moratorium now about to be voted will not need to be renewed to make it permanent. A precedent of postponement is about to be set. Once set, like a prairie fire, it may spread.

At this point let me call attention to crystallizing public opinion relating to the debts, not only of America but of the world.

I read from a signed news article published within the last few days:

> Charles E. Mitchell, head of the National City Bank, of New York, brought his testimony before the Senate Finance Committee yesterday to a dramatic close by prophesying a movement of the youth of Europe and America to cast off the yoke of war debts. The well-groomed, thick-set banker shook a warning finger at the members of the committee and gave them such an unvarnished picture of future world financial events that they sat back in silence while he declared:
>
> "I can not see that Germany would go on paying until all her debts are concluded. I think it would lead to rebellion to insist upon it.
>
> "There are Germans now growing up who were not born at the time of the war. They see that they are under this heavy yoke, of which they are not responsible. The same is true of the youth of France, England, and Italy.
>
> * * * * *
> "I am not preaching a doctrine of cancellation. I am merely trying to develop the psychology of the people.
>
> "It would be a miracle if by any sudden change Europe were able to resume payments on her debts."

Otto H. Kahn, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., while before the Finance Committee on yesterday is reported to have said:

> It is a wicked thing to compel debtors in times like these, which are beyond his power, to neglect going to extremes to make it possible for them to tide things over.

He added that this should be done by the Government and everybody else.

According to the Associated Press, Le Temps, a widely read newspaper of Paris, said only two days ago:

> Whether Americans desire it or not, they will be forced by events to examine the debts problem in the light of international relations and the financial and economic necessities of the whole world, which it is in nobody's power to suppress.

On December 19, three days ago, Col. Leonard P. Ayres, vice president of the Cleveland Trust Co., a noted economist and recognized business analyst, by the Associated Press is quoted as follows:

> For 1932 the economist predicted smaller gold exports, less money in circulation, more commercial failures, smaller dividends, lower cost of living, and lower earnings for industrial and railroad employees.

Mr. President, if these analyses and prophesies are verified and come true, the day is near at hand when the property of the country will be in the hands of the privileged few and the great masses of the people will be economic serfs and slaves.

In a favored land, populated by an enlightened people, there must be some possible plan of relief. Our duty is to find such plan, and then when found to place it in operation.

Why is this moratorium proposal now before us?

Why are banks failing?

Why are companies and industries going bankrupt?

Why are railways in distress?

Why are the people cold, naked, and hungry?

The answer to each question is—lack of money.

The President does not agree with this conclusion. On page 6 of his first message he says:

> We have enormous volumes of idle money in the banks and in hoarding.

On the same page he says:

> One billion one hundred million dollars of currency was previously withdrawn which has still to return to circulation.

If the President is correct, of course my conclusions are in error.

What about this "enormous volume of idle money in the banks and in hoarding"?

How much money have the banks? Let the record speak.

On page 127 of the latest report of the Comptroller of the Currency we find that all the reporting banks in the United States and possessions have total resources of over $70,209,000,000; that they have total deposits of over $56,864,000,000, and that they have total cash, gold, silver, and currency, in the total sum of only $884,000,000.

If we subtract the cash on hand from the total deposits in the banks, we get the sum of $55,980,000,000. The President evidently thinks this $55,980,000,000 is some kind of actual money; but it is not gold; it is not silver; and it is not currency. It is nothing more than credit. It is only a massed debt which the twenty-odd thousand banks of the country owe to their depositor customers. Should any one insist that this $56,864,000,000 of deposits is actual money, ask him how much of such sum could be taken from the banks and hoarded.

While the record shows that we have over $56,000,000,000 on deposit, the same record shows that on July 31, 1930, we had only $4,426,493,631 in circulation.

Where is this actual money—gold, silver and currency—that is admitted to be in circulation and outside the Treasury?

The same record shows that $884,000,000 of the sum is in the vaults of the reporting banks. The President advises us that at least $1,100,000,000 is still in hiding. The best estimates are that over $500,000,000 of American money is in foreign countries. One hundred million dollars is in Cuba alone. The balance, or only $1,942,000,000, is alleged to be sufficient to transact the business of the richest, strongest, and most influential Nation of the earth.

The best times this country ever saw were back about 10 years ago, times when the largest amount of real money was in circulation. In 1920 the actual cash outside the Treasury was some $6,300,000,000. By making allowances for the money necessarily in the vaults of the banks, allowances for the money in foreign countries, and allowances for the small sums in hiding, we still had at that time more than double the actual cash in active circulation that we have to-day.

With double the cash in circulation, cotton sold in 1920 for 40 cents per pound; oats sold for $1 per bushel; wheat sold for $2 per bushel; corn sold for $1.75 per bushel; and oil sold for $3.50 per barrel.

In 1920, with the largest amount of money in circulation in history, we had the highest commodity prices in a generation. During that era, instead of men hunting work, there was employment for all.

In 1930–31, with the smallest amount of money in circulation since the war era, we find commodity prices the lowest in a century and our own country on the verge of an economic collapse.

Mr. President, I am not now advocating that we return to the war prices of 1917 to 1920; but I am demanding that we return to the prices current when the great mass of our indebtedness was created. No one qualified to speak denies that this can be brought about.

John Stuart Mill said:

> The value of money is inversely as general prices, falling as they rise and rising as they fall.

Again he said:

> The value of money, other things being the same, varies inversely as its quantity; every increase of quantity lowering the value and every dimunition raising it in a ratio exactly equivalent.

Ricardo says:

> The value of money in any country is determined by the amount existing; that commodities would rise or fall in price in proportion to the increase or diminution of money I assume as a fact that is incontrovertible.

Sir James Graham says:

> The value of money is in the inverse ratio of its quantity, the supply of commodities remaining the same.

Torrens says:

> If the value of all other commodities in relation to gold rises and falls as their quantities diminish or increase, the value of gold in relation to commodities must rise and fall as its quantity diminished or increased.

Jevon says:

> There is plenty of evidence to prove that an inconvertible paper money, if carefully limited in quantity, can retain its full value.

N. A. Nicholson, of Oxford, in his Science of Exchange, says:

> Whatever substance may be used as currency, an excessive quantity of it (more than is required by the wants of the community) necessarily causes a diminution of its purchasing power.

Taussig states the proposition most simply, as follows:

> Double the quantity of money and, other things being equal, prices will be twice as high as before and the value of money one-half. Halve the quantity of money and, other things being equal, prices will be one-half what they were before and the value of money double.

Ruffner, in his Principles of Economics, says:

> Doubling the amount of money tends to double prices.

Again, he says:

> The price level in the country will tend to rise in proportion to the increase in the money supply.

Mr. President, in 1920, when circulation was at its peak, a movement was inaugurated to decrease the amount thereby making money scarce and consequently dear and at the same time reducing commodity prices on the pretext of lowering the high cost of living.

It did not take legislation to effectuate this result. The Federal reserve acted, machinery was placed in motion, deflation started, and the end is not yet in sight.

If the Federal reserve has been able to convert America prosperous into America impoverished, then if it is not already too late, why will not a reversal of past policies bring about at least a measure of relief?

Dr. Irving Fisher says:

> The Federal reserve has the power to control inflation and deflation through its control of interest rates which control the stream of bank credit—a stream which to-day is far more important than gold as an agency of inflation and deflation.

On yesterday the President's Unofficial Committee on Unemployment Relief is reported to have decided against the issuance of bonds to finance public works to the end that the unemployed may have work, and gave as the reason that such an issue "would cause serious declines in the market values of the present outstanding low-yield issues and thus result in severe losses to holders of such securities."

Mr. President, it would seem that the leaders of our Government to-day can see but one class or group of our people, and that group is the comparatively few fortunate individuals who hold Government securities.

What about the holders of securities on farms, city property, and industrial institutions? Such securities have already depreciated through lack of buying power of the people. Government securities will be the last to be affected, but the present policy will surely bring about conditions under which even the interest on such obligations may come to default.

Avarice, greed, and unrestrained power have brought the world to its knees. America is the world's creditor Nation. Vast sums are owing us and are payable in gold. Our debtors must secure gold to liquidate their obligations. How can our neighbor nations secure the gold when we already have practically one-half of the world's monetary supply hoarded in our strong boxes here at home? Some might say that they can pay us in goods, but reasons exist why this is likewise impossible.

Mr. President, I was in a way consulted relative to the pending issue. I replied that I indorsed the proposal on two conditions—first, that an international conference be called in the hope of arriving at a better understanding among the nations to the end that such nations should have an opportunity of assisting in bringing about a cessation of the existing depression; and second, that a nation-wide program for necessary internal improvements be initiated and developed to the end that "our men, our neighbors, our citizens, honest, hard-working folk," your constituents and mine, might be tided over.

Such conditions have not been complied with.

Again, there is coupled with this proposal an evident plan to scale down or cancel altogether the obligations due our Government. I am opposed to such a program.

Cancellation, in effect, equals repudiation, and either policy will transfer the debts from the peoples who received the money to the taxpayers of America.

Mr. President, the trend of developments and developing policies makes it impossible for me to support the pending joint resolution.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, "Pay our bonus before you help foreigners." This is the substance of many telegrams I have received. They come from those who crossed the sea to uphold the honor of their country and the principles for which it stands. Their attitude is natural and sincere.

I doubt, however, if they grasp the real purpose and object of this moratorium. I am going to vote for it, not so much to help Europe as to help our own people. If it would benefit only Europe, I would be less interested in it.

How does it help us and our people? There may be honest differences of opinion as to the cause of our industrial condition. I believe it comes largely from, and is being prolonged by, the situation in Europe. Correct that and prosperity will come quickly to our people. The wheels of industry will soon begin to turn. Labor will be employed, and capital will become active. This will bring good to all of our people, including the soldiers. This moratorium is intended to help do this.

The nations involved owe us money. They are impoverished by the war. They can not meet their payments to us. They want to do it. To be in default without our consent reflects dishonor upon them. This would affect acutely their whole industrial fabric and might bring an utter collapse. This would add greatly to our distress and trouble. We are giving this moratorium on the same theory that an individual gives an extension of time to a debtor who is unable to pay his debt when due, but hopes to do it in the future. Instead of losing what is now due, we hope to get it in the future.

This is no debt cancellation. It is simply a postponement looking toward the payment of a debt that seems now in great danger of being lost entirely.

We can not force payment. There is no court that we can go into, if these nations refuse to pay, except the court of war; and we are not going to war to enforce the payment of money.

Much is said about the cancellation of foreign debts. That question is not involved in this proposition at all. I want to state briefly, however, my position.

I thought at the time, and I think so now, that we have canceled a greater portion of these debts than we really should. Then was the time to complain of cancellation, not now. I am utterly opposed to any further cancellation of them, at least until after the disarmament conference meets and acts. The nations of the world engaging in that conference should be given to understand clearly and distinctly that this Government will not consider at all any further cancellation of debts until after the completion of the conference. If this conference makes definite and substantial advance along the line of curtailing armaments, then we may give further consideration to the question of a further cancellation of foreign governmental indebtedness, but under no other circumstances or conditions whatever. Not even then do I commit myself to a policy of further cancellation.

I want to say further that the vote I shall cast on this proposition will not affect in the slightest degree my vote upon the question of further cash payment of the balance of the bonus. I do not consider the two questions related in any way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is still on its second reading and open to amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, from the statement of the Chair I judge that there is no pending amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are two amendments printed and lying on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. My understanding was—I may be wrong about that—that my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] had offered an amendment, and that it was pending. I simply now want to know what the facts are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the RECORD, the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] offered an amendment which he asked to go over. The Chair understood, at the time the Senator offered it, that he wished to have it immediately considered; but afterwards it developed that he did not. Therefore it was printed, and is lying on the table and may be presented at any time.

The joint resolution is on its second reading and open to amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I want to say just a word of explanation of my stand on this joint resolution.

I was out in the northwestern part of North Dakota at the time I received the telegram from President Hoover, which was dated June 24. The telegram reached me on the 26th of June, and I replied on the same date. I desire to read the telegram I sent:

> I have been out for two weeks in the drought-stricken counties of this State. Conditions are most deplorable, and assistance must be had. Conditions of farmers everywhere are mighty bad. I believe that a moratorium for all farmers is absolutely necessary; and if that can be provided for I will gladly vote for a moratorium for intergovernmental debts.

Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. NYE] this afternoon offered an amendment to this joint resolution which would provide for the granting to the farmers who have loans under the Federal farm land banks the same privilege for the same length of time as the moratorium provided by this joint resolution gives to our foreign debtors. If that amendment can be adopted, I shall be glad to vote for the joint resolution.

Mr. President, there is no question about the hard conditions of the foreign countries; but we have hard conditions here in our own country. If there is anyone who is in a harder situation or harder up than the farmers of these drought-stricken counties out in the middle Northwest, I do not know who he is; and God pity him if he is in any worse condition than those drought-stricken farmers are. Many of those farmers have been foreclosed on during the past few months by the Federal farm land bank of that district.

I have in my office a county paper—the official paper of the county—giving advertisements of nine foreclosures by the Federal farm land bank in that one county at one time. Some of those seemed so unjust that an appeal was taken to the local district judges, asking that these loans be held up and foreclosure be made through the courts; and in six instances out of the nine the injunction was granted by the local judges.

Mr. President, I believe that our own people should be taken care of in preference to the people of foreign nations. The Government should look after the interests of its own people. Under the present existing conditions, with some eight or ten million men and women out of employment, many of them and their families depending upon charity, and in some instances going hungry; with thousands of farmers who have been foreclosed on and put out of business, yes, hundreds of thousands of them; with the farmers throughout the Nation having been forced this year to sell their products below the cost of production, thus making it impossible for them to meet their expenses or to pay installments on loans, it seems to me it is the duty of Congress to take thought and pass legislation for the benefit of our own people before considering the welfare of foreign countries.

For that reason, unless, as I stated in my telegram and have previously stated, provision can first be made for taking care of our own people, I shall vote against this joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] has been taken suddenly ill. On his behalf, unless some one else desires to speak on the general subject of the joint resolution before any amendment is offered, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the clerk's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The senior Senator from Nebraska offers, on behalf of his colleague [Mr. HOWELL], the following amendment:

On page 2, line 24, after "United States" insert a semicolon and the following: "nor shall such agreement be made with any government until it shall have effectively assented, in a form and manner satisfactory to the President, to the reformation of the Versailles treaty, including the return to the German Government of its former but now mandated colonies."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the proposed amendment will come at the bottom of page 2.

I regret very much that my colleague himself can not be present to make the argument which he would be prepared to make if he were able to remain in the Chamber.

The principal object sought by this amendment is the reformation of the Versailles treaty. I believe it is generally conceded by the civilized world that the Versailles treaty will sooner or later have to be reformed.

Is it not a good thing, Mr. President, when we are proposing to these nations a moratorium, that we should include in the proposition the condition that in order to get the extension of time we are giving them here, we should ask them to agree to a reformation of the Versailles treaty? In this particular amendment my colleague has provided that the reformation of the treaty shall include the return to the German Government of its former but now mandated colonies.

This particular provision, as I understand it, is put in for the reason that my colleague [Mr. HOWELL], in the preparation of this amendment, was moved with a desire to bring about the permanent peace of the world as far as it could be brought about by the reformation of this treaty, and he believes—and I do not see how his belief can be successfully criticized—that until the colonies of Germany are restored to Germany, there never can be a permanent peace.

He is perhaps thinking of the difficulty which has arisen in years past between Germany and France over Alsace and Lorraine. We can not arbitrarily take from one government part of its domain, part of the country over which it rules, and give it to another, and expect it to be forgotten. Human nature is the same everywhere, it is the same in all nationalities. While by power, by pure force, some of its territory may be taken from one government and given to another, a bitter feeling will still slumber. The mothers will teach their children hatred of the other government. There is nothing so bad for the civilization of the world as the inculcating in the hearts of growing men and women of a hatred, and the hatred that is taught at the mother's knee will last during lifetime, however long that may be. It will be perpetuated and carried on to the children who are yet unborn, who eventually will become the leaders and the rulers of the various governments of the world.

It is the theory, in putting in this language, that as long as we tear asunder the parts which make up a great empire or a great country, the hatred engendered will never die, that it will always be there. It may be a hundred years, but eventually it will break out, eventually it will come to the surface. In the meantime there can be no such thing as the necessary friendly feeling between the nations which brings about and perpetuates peace between them.

Mr. President, it seems to me there are some other things that ought to be said which do not apply directly to this amendment. There is no question about the amendment having a very high, noble object. It may not appeal to all Senators as it does to me or as it does to my colleague, but I believe that it is one of the things which must be brought about eventually in order to make this world safe for democracy. Perhaps it is not the only thing. But we can not by law, we can not by force of arms, change human nature. People may be conquered, people may be held in subjection by military force, but human nature will remain the same through all time.

The President in his message has referred to some of the difficulties in regard to peace. One of them is the disarmament question, and I want to read what President Hoover has said:

The burden of taxes to support armaments is greater to-day than before the Great War, and the economic instability of the world is definitely due in part to this cause and the fears which these huge armaments at all times create.

That has not anything directly to do with this particular amendment, but it does throw light upon one of the things the President had in view. It seems to me it shows conclusively that, in making this proposal for a moratorium, the President should have attached a condition on the armament question. He says, and he says truly:

The burden of taxes to support armaments is greater to-day than before the Great War.

That applies to the entire civilized world, ourselves included. More money is being spent for armaments, in preparation for war, than was ever spent before the Great War, which we fought to make the world safe against just such thing. Yet the burden is greater.

As long as the President initiated the question of armaments, I believe that, if he wanted disarmament and desired to get something for the peace of the world, and particularly for our own country, he ought to have said, "We will give this extension on condition that you stop using your funds in armaments, in the building of navies, and the equipment of armies."

That, it seems to me, would have called the attention of the world to what he says in his statement here, which is true, that the world is spending more money now in preparation for war than it did before it fought the war to end war.

The civilized world is in a foolish position, for after having gone into the terrible struggle and turmoil and suffering of the greatest war in the history of civilization, when we entered into treaties like the Kellogg peace pact and other treaties, in the face of the fact that we fought a war to end war, in the face of the fact that we have treaties with all the nations of the world that we shall never be the aggressor in a war, it would have been very opportune for the President to have said to the world, "We will grant you this concession if you will stop spending your money foolishly in getting ready to fight us and the balance of the civilized nations."

It is a fact undisputed, I think, that if these nations had ceased their expenditure of public money for the purpose of preparing for war they would have had more than enough money to have paid what was due us on the 15th day of this month. If they had come with a proposition for the remission of even part of the debt—of any part of it or of all of it—with clean hands and had said, "If you will do us this favor in a financial way we will agree that armaments among the civilized nations of the world shall cease," we would have felt like extending this favor. The only practical way, it seems to me, in which we can give the world to understand that we are sincere in our treaties is to stop building warships and equipping large standing armies, especially at a time when the people of the world are bowed down in misery and starvation because there is not enough employment and not enough money to buy the food that is bursting the elevators and the storehouses—there is not enough money to pay for it in order to feed those who are starving.

The President says in another place in the same message:

I wish further to add that while this action has no bearing on the conference for limitation of land armaments to be held next February, inasmuch as the burden of competitive armaments has contributed to bring about this depression, we trust that by this evidence of our desire to assist we shall have contributed to the good will which is so necessary to the solution of this major question.

Again the President has said in this message that armaments stand in the way of peace, and although this has no bearing, why should it not have been put in such a way that it would have had a bearing—that it would have had a direct bearing? The idea of the President is that we should make this donation; that we should give, even before they have asked it, this extension of time for the payment of the money that was due on the 15th of December, in order to make the other nations feel good when we meet them next February at a disarmament conference; in other words, do what we have been doing, do what we did during and after the war, take our money, the money of our taxpayers, and give it to others in order to buy their good will.

The Senator from California read the list of the nations who owe us money and who are going to get the benefit of this unasked-for favor if we pass this joint resolution. The proposition now is for us to give them this in order that there will be good will next February when we meet them in conference to get disarmament.

If we will give them some money, they will feel good and perhaps agree, in the President's judgment, in the disarmament conference to a lessening of the expenditure of public money for armaments. It would have been much better if this extension, especially when we grant it without having been asked to grant it, had been offered upon condition that there should be a reduction of armaments.

The Senator from California read the list, to which I referred a moment ago, of a large number of nations to whom we had loaned money. Little Liberia, over in Africa, which never had a soldier or a warship, declared war against Germany and got money from our Treasury. Countries in South America declared war against Germany and got money from us. So, almost all over the world, any little nation which would declare war against Germany could hold out its hand and we would grease the palm with millions of money which belonged to our people.

We had to borrow every dollar of that money. We have been paying interest on it ever since. Any nation which wanted to declare war against Germany could come to our Treasury and get what money they wanted. I do not suppose Germany found out even that some of those nations had ever declared war against her. Nobody knew that many of them did. They had no navy; they had no army; but they wanted some money, and Uncle Sam, it seems, was looked to from all over the world to hand out money. He did it regularly, amounting not alone to millions but to billions—and many billions of dollars. That money was expended in order to array some more nations against Germany in the Great War. I do not even know whether those nations have ever gone through the formality of entering into a treaty of peace with Germany. As I said, they have forgotten it now, and Germany probably never knew it. It had nothing to do with the war and made no difference in the war. The only thing was that they got some of Uncle Sam's money.

The point to which I desire to call attention is that our people in toil and in sweat for the last 10 or 12 years have been working, now under adverse circumstances, to pay the interest on the money that our Government borrowed in order to make these loans. To many of the other nations the loans were greater. They used the money in the war and probably did a great deal of good with it. But when the war was over they all started again in a world-wide race to beat each other in the building of war vessels and land armaments, in the enlisting and drafting of standing armies all over the world greater than had ever before existed. They are doing that now. The real effect of it is that our people in the United States are paying for the support of the armies and navies in those countries to which we have loaned money. We are paying the bill. It is our money. We had to borrow it when we got it. We are going to be paying taxes and interest on it during the lives of many people not yet born. We will continue to pay those taxes.

Now we have reached the point where our people are suffering from hardships, where millions of our people are starving, where millions of little children are shivering with cold, innocent though they are of any harm, because their parents are not able to get employment, are not able to pay for the support of those who are dependent upon them. Instead of looking after their wants, instead of using this money to make public improvements that would give jobs to hundreds and millions of men and women, we are asking even our creditors in Europe not to pay us anything.

They have not asked for it, but we say to them in effect, "We will let our children starve, our men and women suffer who are out of employment and who can not get enough to live on. We will not take your money," we say to these other nations. What are they going to do with it? They are going to build warships and build up their standing armies, using the money for the purpose of equipping their armies with armaments. That is what they are doing with it, and we close our eyes to the suffering in our own country in order that we may induce those nations across the ocean to use the money, that our suffering people ought to have, for the purpose of getting ready for another world war.

Mr. President, I think all of this applies directly to my colleague's amendment. I know that those who favor the moratorium or those who are trying to crash it through by the steam-roller process will say, "We must not amend the resolution. We must not dot an 'i' or cross a 't' in it. We must not send it back with an amendment to the House of Representatives, otherwise the plan for adjournment might be interfered with." Perhaps it would be interfered with. Perhaps that would be the result. But that would be a good thing for us, I believe. If we amend the joint resolution and it can not be approved to-day by the House of Representatives and our adjournment resolution has to be changed and we have to stay here, what is the difference? Would it not be better to try to do something in the first place for world peace as this kind of an amendment would do?

In the next place, it would give some encouragement and succor, while we are here even during the holidays, to those of our own people who are suffering now more than they have ever suffered in the history of the country.

Mr. President, when we reach a vote I shall ask for a roll call on behalf of my colleague on his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the statement of Hon. Ogden L. Mills before the Finance Committee upon the question now before the Senate be printed at this point in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator ask that it be printed now?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why not wait until we are all through?

Mr. SMOOT. It will not make any difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Does the Senator from California object?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no; I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Utah is granted.

The statement is as follows:

POSTPONEMENT OF INTERGOVERNMENTAL DEBTS

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
Washington, D. C., December 16, 1931.

The committee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., pursuant to call of the chairman, in the committee room, Capitol, Senator REED SMOOT (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators SMOOT, WATSON, REED, SHORTRIDGE, COUZENS, KEYES, BINGHAM, LA FOLLETTE, THOMAS of Idaho, JONES, METCALF, HARRISON, KING, GEORGE, WALSH of Massachusetts, BARKLEY, CONNALLY, GORE, COSTIGAN, and HULL.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. We will hear Under Secretary Mills. As I stated, each Senator will find a copy of the joint resolution on his desk.

STATEMENT OF HON. OGDEN L. MILLS, THE UNDER SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Under Secretary MILLS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to begin by offering for the record a statement made by the President of the United States on June 20, 1931. Of course, all of you gentlemen have read the statement. I think it may be desirable to refresh your recollection by reading it. I am omitting the names of those Senators and Representatives who at that time had already signified their approval of the proposal. [Reading:]

"The American Government proposes the postponement during one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, both principal and interest, of course, not including obligations of governments held by private parties. Subject to confirmation by Congress, the American Government will postpone all payments upon the debts of foreign governments to the American Government payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1 next, conditional on a like postponement for one year of all payments on intergovernmental debts owing the important creditor powers.

"The purpose of this action is to give the forthcoming year to the economic recovery of the world and to help free the recuperative forces already in motion in the United States from retarding influences from abroad.

"The world-wide depression has affected the countries of Europe more severely than our own. Some of these countries are feeling to a certain extent the drain of this depression on national economy. The fabric of intergovernmental debts, supportable in normal times, weighs heavily in the midst of this depression.

"From a variety of causes arising out of the depression such as the fall in the price of foreign commodities and the lack of confidence in economic and political stability abroad there is an abnormal movement of gold into the United States which is lowering the credit stability of many foreign countries. These and the other difficulties abroad diminish buying power for our exports and in a measure are the cause of our continued unemployment and continued lower prices to our farmers.

"Wise and timely action should contribute to relieve the pressure of these adverse forces in foreign countries and should assist in the reestablishment of confidence, thus forwarding political peace and economic stability in the world.

"Authority of the President to deal with this problem is limited as this action must be supported by the Congress. It has been assured the cordial support of leading members of both parties in the Senate and the House. The essence of this proposition is to give time to permit debtor governments to recover their national prosperity. I am suggesting to the American people that they be wise creditors in their own interest and be good neighbors.

"I wish to take this occasion also to frankly state my views upon our relations to German reparations and the debts owed to us by the allied governments of Europe. Our Government has not been a party to, or exerted any voice in determination of, reparation obligations. We purposely did not participate in either general reparations or the division of colonies or property. The repayment of debts due to us from the Allies for the advances for war and reconstruction was settled upon a basis not contingent upon German reparations or related thereto. Therefore, reparations is necessarily wholly a European problem with which we have no relation.

"I do not approve in any remote sense of the cancellation of the debts to us. World confidence would not be enhanced by such action. None of our debtor nations has ever suggested it. But as the basis of the settlement of these debts was the capacity under normal conditions of the debtor to pay, we should be consistent with our own policies and principles if we take into account the abnormal situation now existing in the world. I am sure the American people have no desire to attempt to extract any sum beyond the capacity of any debtor to pay and it is our view that broad vision requires that our Government should recognize the situation as it exists.

"This course of action is entirely consistent with the policy which we have hitherto pursued. We are not involved in the discussion of strictly European problems, of which the payment of German reparations is one. It represents our willingness to make a contribution to the early restoration of world prosperity in which our own people have so deep an interest.

"I wish further to add that while this action has no bearing on the conference for limitation of land armaments to be held next February, inasmuch as the burden of competitive armaments has contributed to bring about this depression, we trust that by this evidence of our desire to assist we shall have contributed to the good will which is so necessary in the solution of this major question."

I now offer, Mr. Chairman, a list of the countries involved, so far as we are concerned, in the suspension of payments, and the amounts due to the United States Government from those countries during the fiscal year 1932, ending June 30, 1932.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be placed in the record.

(The statement referred to is printed in full, as follows:)

Dec. 15, 1931.

Senator HARRISON. What is the aggregate amount, Mr. Secretary?

Under Secretary MILLS. The aggregate amount is $252,000,000 and some odd thousands of dollars.

Senator GORE. I want to ask Mr. Mills if he will insert into the record at this point the joint statement signed by the President and Premier Laval?

Under Secretary MILLS. I will be very glad to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want it read, Senator?

Senator GORE. No; just insert it.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose all of us have read it.

Senator HARRISON. Yes; but I think it is clearer than the President's statement.

Under Secretary MILLS. I think the President's statement is very clear, Senator. And that is one thing I want to emphasize.

Senator GORE. In view of the conflict between the statement just read and that statement, I would like to have it in the record at this point to compare it.

Senator BINGHAM. May I ask the Senator from Oklahoma what the point is? Just what is the point at issue there?

Senator GORE. The joint statement issued by President Hoover and Premier Laval.

Senator BINGHAM. Yes; I understand that, but what is the point?

Senator GORE. There was an inference that there was a joint agreement on the reparations and the international debt; that they constitute a departure from our policy; and I think it should be stated at this place so that the people may compare them.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be inserted in the record.

[The joint statement referred to is here printed in full, as follows:]

OCTOBER 25, 1931.

A JOINT STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL OF MINISTERS OF FRANCE

"The traditional friendship between the United States and France, the absence of all controversy between our two Governments, a record of many events in collaboration toward peace of the world, embracing among its recent phases the adoption of the Kellogg-Briand pact, render it possible and opportune for the representatives of our governments to explore every aspect of the many problems in which we are mutually interested.

"Indeed, the duty of statesmen is not to overlook any means of practical cooperation for the common good. This is particularly true at a time when the world looks for leadership in relief from a depression which reaches into countless homes in every land. Relations of mutual confidence between governments have the most important bearing upon speeding the recovery which we seek. We have engaged upon that mission with entire frankness. We have made real progress.

"We canvassed the economic situation in the world, the trends in international relations bearing upon it; the problems of the forthcoming conference for limitation and reduction of armaments; the effect of the depression on payments under intergovernmental debts; the stabilization of international exchanges and other financial and economic subjects.

"An informal and cordial discussion has served to outline with greater precision the nature of the problems. It has not been the purpose of either of us to engage in commitments binding our Governments, but rather, through development of fact, to enable each country to act more effectively in its own field.

"It is our joint purpose that the conference for limitation of armaments will not fail to take advantage of the great opportunity which presents itself, and that it will be capable of meeting what is in reality its true mission; that is, the organization on a firm foundation of permanent peace. In so far as intergovernmental obligations are concerned, we recognize that prior to the expiration of the Hoover year of postponement some agreement regarding them may be necessary covering the period of business depression as to the terms and conditions of which the two Governments make all reservations. The initiative in this matter should be taken at an early date by the European powers principally concerned within the framework of the agreements existing prior to July 1, 1931.

"Our especial emphasis has been upon the more-important means through which the efforts of our Governments could be exerted toward restoration of economic stability and confidence. Particularly are we convinced of the importance of monetary stability as an essential factor in the restoration of normal economic life in the world, in which the maintenance of the gold standard in France and the United States will serve as a major influence.

"It is our intent to continue to study methods for the maintenance of stability in international exchanges.

"While in the short time at our disposal it has not been possible to formulate definite programs, we find that we view the nature of these financial and economic problems in the same light and that this understanding on our part should serve to pave the way for helpful action by our respective Governments."

Senator REED. Mr. Chairman, would it not be better to let the Under Secretary proceed with his statement without interruption, and then afterwards propound any questions?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator COUZENS. I want to ask this question: If there was any representation to the matter of 10 payments, instead of a year's moratorium?

Under Secretary MILLS. No, Senator COUZENS; the original proposition was to postpone the 1932 payments to 1933. And if you visualize these payments as a ladder, what we proposed to do was to lift the ladder up so that 1932 would fall in 1933.

Now, the French objected very strenuously to that procedure, and after long negotiations it was agreed that the earlier proposition should not be used but that the postponed payments should be paid over a 10-year period, rather than in 1933.

Senator REED. In other words, we get our money sooner as it now stands than under the President's original proposition?

Under Secretary MILLS. Absolutely so.

Senator COUZENS. Then I insist that the President's moratorium statement does not apply to the 10-year period. My understanding is that the moratorium payments, if there is an extension of payments, will be made in the following year. That is the general understanding, I understood, of those who agreed with the President at the time of the statement.

Under Secretary MILLS. Well, it is always dangerous to rely on your memory, but I think in all of the conversations which I had with Members of the Senate and of the House I explained very clearly the thing we had in mind, and I used the latter illustration at that time.

Senator COUZENS. It is not in the President's statement.

Under Secretary MILLS. No; it is not. But the bill now before you provides that the payments shall be made in 10 years, with 4 per cent.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Mills, may I ask you if you have a copy of the telegram which was sent to the Members of Congress who were not in Washington at that time?

Under Secretary MILLS. No; I have not, Senator.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Could you get a copy of that and put it in?

Senator COUZENS. I would like to ask Mr. Mills what is his idea of the moratorium?

Under Secretary MILLS. As it stands now?

Senator COUZENS. Assuming that the controversy with France had not arisen, what would be the Secretary's idea about the 1-year moratorium?

Under Secretary MILLS. If we had not had an understanding with France?

Senator COUZENS. Supposing there was no agreement with France, what would be the Secretary's idea of the 1-year moratorium?

Under Secretary MILLS. Well, of course, when you say payments shall not be made now, the question at once arises, when shall they be paid? That is, I suggest, a matter of understanding with our debtors. As I said, the idea was that the international government payments should be pushed forward one year; that is, 1932 should be pushed forward to 1933; 1933 should be pushed forward to 1934, and so on. Now, France, one of our debtor nations, disagreed with that and insisted that all payments should be repaid over a 10-year period. And that is the proposition which was accepted by all creditor governments who signed the London protocol, and that is the understanding now before the Congress of the United States.

Senator KING. Mr. Mills, if I owed a private individual an obligation which matured on the 1st of January of this coming year and I asked for a moratorium for one year, would not the general impression be that I would pay the debt then and not try to extend it out over a 10-year period?

Under Secretary MILLS. Well, I think you have got to apply the rule of reason. If the world as a whole could not meet these obligations in the year 1932, it is very obvious that you are giving them no relief by doubling them in 1933. In other words, suspend the payment in 1932 to the extent of $252,000,000, and then ask them to pay $500,000,000 in 1933 would be no relief at all. That would be a preposterous situation.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest, with due respect to the members, that Mr. Mills be permitted to proceed, rather than to engage in a cross fire of questions.

Senator HARRISON. This is one of the most interesting propositions to settle.

Senator COUZENS. I think this is one of the important matters to settle, and I think it should be discussed as we go along, because, as I understand, it was the understanding of the Members of Congress that this payment should be suspended for one year; and I submit there is nothing in the President's statement which gives any other implication.

Under Secretary MILLS. I just want to say on that, and I can say with absolute certainty, Senator COUZENS, with due respect, I participated in many of the interviews which the President had with many of the Members of both Houses who were in Washington; and I telephoned personally to many Members of the House, and I believe to some of the Members of the Senate, and at no time was it remotely suggested that the payments due in 1932 should be paid in 1933. I never entertained such a notion, and no one suggested such a notion, and I say it would have been a preposterous notion.

Senator COUZENS. Mr. Secretary, if it was a preposterous situation, would it not be time enough to take it up when the time arrives? In other words, I do not want to go into a personal conversation I had with the President, but I want to say that at no time was any suggestion ever made to me that this 1932 payment, or the payment for that period, should be extended beyond a year.

Under Secretary MILLS. Well, as a matter of fact, I think that the matter was pretty well left open, Senator, and the only suggestion that I ever heard made was that everything should be pushed forward one year, until after the negotiations with the French and the 10-year proposal was agreed upon.

Senator CONNALLY. I do not want to interrupt the Secretary, but may I ask a question?

Under Secretary MILLS. Certainly, Senator.

Senator CONNALLY. And your idea is that the whole payments should be pushed forward one year.

Under Secretary MILLS. That is my idea.

Senator CONNALLY. And the 10 were installment payments proposed by the French, and the reason was that France did not want to jeopardize her reparations payments from Germany?

Under Secretary MILLS. Exactly. France wanted to maintain the legal status of her annuities which she gets. She would not enter into the negotiations unless that was assured. She was absolutely determined that the legal status of her annuities should be maintained, and they devised a method by which the legal status could be maintained by having the German Government pay the annuity to the Bank for International Settlements, and that would be at once reloaned to the German railroads. So that this year the annuity payments are being actually made, and they are being at once returned to Germany. So it is a wash transaction and no drain on Germany.

Senator CONNALLY. In that connection, while the President says the reparations are none of our concern, do we not become involved in those discussions between Germany and France?

Under Secretary MILLS. I do not think we do.

Senator CONNALLY. And have we not made our withholding demand for payment conditional on France granting leeway to Germany in the reparations?

Under Secretary MILLS. Senator, that is one of the phases I wanted to develop in discussing this whole proposition.

Senator CONNALLY. I beg your pardon.

Under Secretary MILLS. I think we, in order to understand the position in which this whole proposition has brought us, must not attack it solely from the standpoint of an uncollected bill or deal with it merely from the technical and legal standpoint of intergovernmental problems, whether they be reparations or intergovernmental debts. If our conception of the matter was correct—and before I get through I want to give you the situation in which we were placed—in order to save what we thought was a world catastrophe, it became necessary to relieve all debtors from international debts during that period, and for that reason it became immaterial whether it was war debts, or relief debts, or relief loans, which the British were treating as a debt, and which generally bear 5 per cent interest, and which are being paid 100 cents on the dollar. We merged our relief debts with our war debts. The British did not. It was found that it was immaterial as to how those debts arose; and they arose in all manner of ways. For instance, the Bulgarian obligations with Greece arose from the transfer of populations long after the war.

If the oppression of the debts was to be lifted from the backs of those nations, then we had to find some comprehensive plan which would include them all. And if the United States was the only nation which was in a position to make the proposal, if we were to take the initiative at the time, and I think we were, then the United States, in order to propose such a formula, had to include itself and say:

"We are willing, as a contribution to saving the world credit and saving the world from economic disaster—we are willing to forego for the time being the obligations that we might collect from foreign governments during this period."

Now, gentlemen, the course of events which started, I think we can say with reasonable definiteness, at the end of May, though, of course, their antecedents run away back to the World War, represent a continuous series which culminated last Sunday when Japan went off the gold basis. And that series is still flowing onward, and the termination of it is not in sight; but right in the center of the picture were the German people. They were the principal factors in this situation. A nation of 60,000,000 people situated in the heart of Europe, stripped of their economic wealth by the war, totally devoid by reason of the war and the invasion which followed of all working capital; no fat whatsoever to live off of; suffering, as was the rest of the world, from this profound depression, but with nothing to fall back on. They are the people whose condition we must study if we want to understand this picture.

Now, German economy after the adoption of the Dawes plan came back with reasonable rapidity. They are a hard-working, industrious, and intelligent people. They were lacking, of course, entirely in capital. Any funds obtained from abroad are in short-term loans and long-time credits. These short-term credits could be turned over as they fell due, and the German people believed they could use them, not only to finance export trade but to finance their industry at home. But with some 10,000,000,000 marks of short-term loans Germany was particularly vulnerable to this kind of depression, and particularly vulnerable once fear crept into men's minds.

Now, in May last the Credit-Anstalt, the principal banking institution in Austria, which controlled or owned a considerable percentage of the Austrian industries, got into such financial difficulties that the Austrian Government had to replace its credit and agree to replenish its capital. The Credit-Anstalt Bank was obliged to turn to other centers in Europe and borrow $14,000,000. Suspicion and fear, because it has been looked upon as one of the strongest banks in southern Europe, crept into the people. And that mistrust and fear crept into Germany.

Now, all during the winter of 1931 German economy had been deteriorating—slowly, but still deteriorating.

Senator WATSON. The winter of 1930.

Under Secretary MILLS. No; of 1931.

Senator WATSON. That is, now.

Under Secretary MILLS. In fact, nearly all of Germany's foreign creditors were beginning to lose faith in Germany. It had not reached the panic stage, but withdrawals were beginning and kept on all during the winter. In fact, Germany lost, from January 1 to July 31, no less than $850,000,000 short-term funds, which represented the capital on which German industries were being operated.

Now, then, as early as June 1 it was clearly evident, from the reports which were received from abroad, that a run had begun on Germany. It was a slow run, but it was unmistakably a run.

On June 6, by decree, the President of the German Republic imposed new and very severe taxes. In order to bolster up German courage and fortitude to bear these additional burdens, and certainly for home consumption, a statement was issued at that time that Germany had to have relief from reparations, and that the capacity of the German people to bear further burdens had definitely reached a limit. Whatever effect that had at home in Germany, the effect on Germany's foreign creditors was immediate. What had been a slow run prior to June 6 developed into a very rapid run, indeed, from June 6 on. The withdrawal of foreign funds from June 1 to June 20 resulted in a reduction of the gold and foreign exchange held by the Reichsbank, which formed its basic reserve, of over 1,000,000,000 reichsmarks, or approximately $250,000,000. This represented approximately two-fifths of the bank's total reserve in gold and foreign exchange. On Friday, June 19, and Saturday, June 20, the withdrawals were so heavy that the reserve of the Reichsbank reached its legal minimum, and it was perfectly obvious that unless these withdrawals should be arrested either the legal limit would have to be set aside on Monday morning, which would have given only temporary relief, or else Germany would have to go off the gold standard on Monday morning, which, as I shall later describe, would have resulted in having literally engulfed Germany in very serious social and economic consequences.

Now, mind you, we sat here from June 6 to the evening of Friday, June 19, watching this run on this great Nation, which was comparable to a run on a great bank, with the reserves gradually being depleted, until it was perfectly obvious by Friday and Saturday that the end was at hand. And it was clear, after the President began, on Friday morning, to lay this situation before the Members of both Houses who could be reached—it was clear that each and every man before whom these facts were laid had said unqualifiedly, "There is only one thing for you to do, Mr. President"—and by noon on Saturday he definitely decided to issue that statement. You may remember that he had been west three days and it was impossible to lay the desperate character of this situation before him until he returned late Thursday, and he began seeing Members of Congress by 9 o'clock on Friday morning.

Now, I may say that probably as early as the 12th or 13th, men like Mr. Owen Young, Mr. Parker Gilbert, who had spent four years in Germany and was thoroughly familiar with German economy, Governor Harrison of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, who has an intimate knowledge, of course, of situations of this kind, had all reached the conclusion that something had to be done. But the President himself did not definitely reach a conclusion until Saturday, June 20.

Now, then; was that action justifiable? I am perfectly confident that no other action could have been taken on June 20, and I am equally satisfied that every event that has followed has simply confirmed and demonstrated the wisdom and judgment used on that occasion. For while all of the high purposes which were entertained on that Saturday afternoon have not been realized, owing to a delay, or extensions, or some other reason not necessary to speculate upon, at least we did avert a major catastrophe. When the markets closed on Saturday, June 20, Germany was on the verge of collapse. When the markets opened on Monday, June 22, the run on Germany had ceased. How important that was to the world was at once evident by the fact that security and commodity prices the world over raised to such an extent that if we had only been able to hold that gain, why, this little temporary loss of $252,000,000 would have sunk into insignificance, so far as the American people were concerned. But there was a long delay. The final proposition was not accepted until July 6, and, pending that delay, this run which had been arrested on Germany was resumed

Already, three days before June 20, the Bank of England, acting on its own initiative, because help apparently could not come from elsewhere, had advanced $21,000,000 to Austria to, as Governor Norman put it, save the ship from sinking.

Now, then, will you bear with me while I very briefly develop the events subsequent to the President's proposal? On July 12 the German Cabinet, after an almost continuous all-night session, issued a communique that since there was no definite prospect of foreign credit the Government would guarantee the liabilities of the two leading banks.

On July 13 the Darmstadter und National Bank closed its doors. The German Government guaranteed its deposits. Those deposits and liabilities were stated to be 1,500,000,000 reichsmarks, of which 450,000,000 reichsmarks were foreign obligations. Other German banks limited withdrawals to 20 per cent of deposits. The Government closed the Berlin exchanges.

On July 14 all banks, including savings banks, were closed in Germany by Government decree. The Budapest bourse was closed. A 3-day bank holiday was declared in Hungary. The Mercer Bank of Vienna, the Banca Dacia, of Jassy, Rumania, and two Latvian banks had failed. Banks in Danzig limited withdrawals to a maximum of 10 per cent of deposits.

On July 15 the Reichsbank raised its rate from 7 per cent to 10 per cent and the "Lombard" rate from 8 per cent to 12 per cent, and all foreign-exchange transactions were brought under the control of the Reichsbank. All Danzig banks were closed until July 17. That same day the British Government invited the principal creditor governments of the European powers to attend a conference in London on July 20. From July 20 to July 23 that conference met in London, and they recommended that the Central Bank credit of $100,000,000 recently granted to the Reichsbank under the auspices of the Bank for International Settlements be renewed at maturity for a period of three months; that concerted measures should be taken by the financial institutions in the different countries with a view to maintaining the volume of credits they had already extended to Germany; and, third, that the Bank for International Settlements should be invited to set up without delay a committee of representatives nominated by the governors of the central banks interested to inquire into the immediate future credit needs of Germany and to study the possibilities of converting a portion of the short-term credits into long-term credits.

On August 18 the committee which had been appointed by the Bank for International Settlements, known as the Wiggin committee, made its report, stating definitely its conclusions and stated that it was necessary:

(1) That the existing volume of Germany's foreign credits should be maintained; and

(2) That part, at all events, of the capital which had been withdrawn should be replaced from foreign sources. The committee also urged that all the governments concerned "lose no time in taking the necessary measures for bringing about such conditions as will allow financial operations to bring to Germany—and thereby to the world—sorely needed assistance."

Now, what I want to point out to you is that when prime ministers, foreign secretaries, and secretaries of the treasury met in London, presumably with their experts, they reached the conclusion that it was absolutely essential, if Germany was to live, that her short-term credit position should be maintained; and that when the Wiggin committee experts met, a few weeks later, they said not only must Germany have every bit of the short-term foreign credit available, but a part at least of the long-term credit must be returned to Germany if she is to live. And it is as a result of the recommendations of the London conference, of the Wiggin committee, of all the bankers—the great commercial bankers of this country, of London, of Amsterdam, and France, agreed that these short-term credits would be maintained for a period of at least six months, and they would then meet and reconsider the situation. Read the Wiggin report. I think it is unnecessary, Mr. Chairman, to insert in the hearings. It is some 12 pages long. It is printed as an appendix to the hearings held by the House Ways and Means Committee, and is available there.

The CHAIRMAN. It will not take much space, and I would suggest that it be printed in these hearings. It is printed there as an appendix?

Under Secretary MILLS. It is, Mr. Chairman. It is long enough to interrupt the continuity of this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be printed as an appendix, at the end of the Under Secretary's statement.

(The so-called Wiggin report appears at the end of to-day's proceedings.)

Senator WALSH. That 6-month period expires in January?

Under Secretary MILLS. In February.

Now, I emphasize this fact—and we have got to accept this fact and this responsibility as creditors: If to live Germany had to retain about 12,000,000,000 reichsmarks of credits outstanding; if they could not be withdrawn from Germany without producing a collapse—and you can not reach any other conclusion after reading the Wiggin report—how in the name of common sense could that nation find $400,000,000 to be paid during this fiscal year?

Senator COUZENS. Do you mind an interruption there?

Under Secretary MILLS. No, sir.

Senator COUZENS. I would ask you what would be your opinion if Germany had gone off the gold standard, the same as England did?

Under Secretary MILLS. I am coming to that in a minute.

Now, I think it is unnecessary to review the weeks succeeding August 18, weeks in which hope and fear alternated. But the trend was still unfavorable. Pressures increased. Fear prevailed, and on September 21, with a shock to world credit such as this generation has never seen, Great Britain was forced off the gold standard. Since that date, Mr. Chairman, no less than 19 nations have been forced to abandon or restrict gold payments, and the world to-day is obliged to transact business with all the handicaps incident to widely fluctuating and uncertain media of exchange. So that, as I said a few moments ago, you can begin with the difficulties of the Credit-Anstalt, and you can carry the story right up to last Sunday, and if you set it out in the form of a daily diary, you will have a connected series of events, a continuous story starting in little Austria in May and ending in far-off Japan on the 13th of December. Could there be clearer or more conclusive evidence of the unity of the world, and particularly the economic world? Could there be clearer evidence that a catastrophe to one nation must necessarily fall, in varying degrees, on other nations of the earth? Could there be a more complete answer to the fallacy which still prevails in this country that somehow we can rise superior to the misfortunes which fall on others, and that by complete isolation we can escape the misfortunes which fall on those who have not the economic resources which we have?

Why, Mr. Chairman, we did not escape. No sooner had England gone off the gold standard; no sooner had the inevitable happened; no sooner had those countries which were operating on the gold-exchange standard—which means you do not carry the actual metal as reserve, but you can carry the exchange of a country which is on a gold basis—no sooner had they realized that the foreign exchange might depreciate overnight because these countries went off the gold standard, that the central banks that had carried their balances in London, which, up to the night of September 20, were payable in gold, woke up on September 21 to find that their basic reserves had depreciated 15 per cent, a reduction which soon was increased to 25 per cent. They began to have doubts of the stability of the credits, and they began to revert to the carrying of gold in their vaults. And as they were carrying large reserves in New York for the purpose of putting those reserves to work and earning something, rather than carrying idle gold in the vaults, the central banks began to call for payment in dollars of gold.

At the same time depositors throughout the world who had seen their sterling balances reduced by 25 per cent almost overnight by a run on London, who had seen Germany brought to the very edge of the abyss by a run on Berlin, began to say, as the gold started out from New York, "History is going to repeat itself. Let us protect ourselves by withdrawing our dollar balances." It is wholly unnecessary to indulge, as some gentlemen have, in the idea that there was a conspiracy against us. It is sheer nonsense. There was no conspiracy.

Senator REED. Lord Rothermere did not exactly help us, did he?

Under Secretary MILLS. No. I make due allowance for the campaigns carried on in the foreign press against the dollar. I will make allowance for that, but I do not think it was the controlling factor, Senator REED. I think it was fear on the part of people carrying deposits in a foreign country. After their experience in Berlin and London, how can we blame the foreigner for withdrawing his balances when during that same period our own people were suffering from a lack of confidence and were withdrawing deposits from their own institutions in order to hoard currency, so that the hoarded currency in this country reached a figure of over one billion.

No, no, gentlemen. You can not start such a train of events anywhere in the world and hope to stand aside and let it brush by your doorstep without affecting you. That is why the action of the President on June 20 was not only essential to the welfare of the world but it was absolutely essential to the welfare of the people of this country.

Now, Senator COUZENS asks a very pertinent question. He said: "Supposing Germany did go off the gold standard, what of it? We have seen England go off the gold standard. We have seen Japan go off the gold standard." We have seen, as you say, 19 countries go off the gold standard, and the world is still here. It is not a particularly prosperous world, not a particularly happy world, but it is still here, still doing business, though on a very much reduced scale.

Senator, Germany was in a very particular and exceptional position. As I have already pointed out, neither her industries nor her foreign commerce was financed through her own capital. She was dependent, to keep her industrial mechanism functioning, on foreign credits of a short-term character. The day the Reichsbank said it would no longer pay gold on foreign exchange all the German banks and every German commercial house that had obligations payable either in dollars, sterling, or some other currency would find it almost impossible to meet those obligations, because foreign exchange would no longer be obtainable in adequate volume.

So that, leaving aside the inevitable run which would have been begun by German depositors themselves on their own banks, and which did actually result in the closing of one of the largest banks, and the closing of all the others by decree—leaving that out of consideration, the inability of German banks and the German business houses to meet their foreign obligations would have compelled a general moratorium almost at once.

Senator COUZENS. Why did not that occur when Great Britain went off the gold standard?

Under Secretary MILLS. If you will bear with me, I am going to differentiate the two cases. I recognize that it is a perfectly fair question. With a general moratorium declared——

Senator COUZENS. But you have gotten ahead of your story. There has been no general moratorium declared.

Under Secretary MILLS. I am saying what would have happened if they had gone off the gold standard.

Senator COUZENS. Is not that an assumption? I do not think you are quite justified in making that assumption.

Under Secretary MILLS. I think I am justified in making that assumption, on the basis that by Saturday they were below their legal limit. I am justified in that assumption, because we were informed by one of the most competent bankers in Europe on Monday morning that if the President had not made his statement on Sunday the Reichsbank would have closed business on Monday; and that was confirmed by a conversation which I had with one of the most competent bankers in France, and certainly when I talked to him, and we were still arguing with the French, he was not particularly interested in making out a case for the President's proposal.

The Reichsbank had reached its legal limit. Its reserves were melting away at the rate of millions of dollars a day. They would have entirely disappeared in the course of another week.

Senator COUZENS. But would they have done so if they had gone off the gold standard?

Under Secretary MILLS. No. What would have happened had the Reichsbank gone off the gold standard is that foreign exchange still held, and the gold still held by the Reichsbank, would have been in its vaults, but it would have been unobtainable. If you, a German bank, carrying a deposit of an American institution of $10,000,000, payable in dollars, were called upon the next day to pay that $10,000,000, you could not have obtained the dollars.

Senator COUZENS. Certainly. That is true.

Under Secretary MILLS. Therefore the German institution, unable to meet its foreign obligations—that applied to all German institutions, all German commercial houses. If, at the same time, they should have been subjected to a run by their own depositors they could not have met their obligations, either domestic or foreign, and the general moratorium must have followed.

Now, then, with a general moratorium, what happens? Every self-liquidating credit is allowed to run off. Let us consider Germany's foreign trade. How did she finance a very large foreign trade for the last eight or nine months? She has extended more liberal credit terms than anyone else. It has not just been a question of price. It has not just been a question of low cost because they have depreciated their standard of living as low as it is humanly possible to do so. It has been because they have given credit. How have they been enabled to give credit? Because they, in turn, were obtaining short-term foreign credit from abroad. Shut off that foreign credit and Germany would have been unable to finance her export trade. How do you think she would have purchased her raw material—yes, the food she needs to support her population? With a general moratorium would anyone have sold food or raw materials to Germany on credit? They would not. They would have demanded cash. That meant foreign exchange, which would have been unobtainable in adequate volume. Germany's foreign trade, export and import, would have paralyzed almost overnight.

What of their home trade? We have already seen that their industries were dependent, for working capital, on foreign credit. With those foreign credits gone, with their export trade gone, how would those industries have prospered or kept going, even at a minimum rate? They had three and a half million men unemployed at the time. Cut off their export trade, and reduce their domestic business owing to the lack of working capital, and instead of some 4,000,000 unemployed, they would have had many millions more.

Can you conceive of a nation of 60,000,000 people, hard working, industrious, cut off from commercial intercourse overnight because credit, the lifeblood of commercial intercourse, has been taken away from them? Can you visualize them in a period of world depression, with their own industries reduced to a point of stagnation? My imagination, Senator, can not visualize such an event, but I can see how such an economic disaster must necessarily be followed by the most serious of social consequences. I can see how such an economic disaster must necessarily spread to all the surrounding countries, until the very civilization of the Old World is threatened.

In any event, I know of no man, advised by the men on whose advice he has to rely—presumably competent to appraise these economic factors—who, being told that that kind of a disaster was staring him in the face, would accept the responsibility for the consequences by failing to take the comparatively simple action that could reasonably be expected to avert it.

Now, you have asked me: What is the difference between Germany and England going off the gold standard? I apologize to the committee for growing rhetorical.

Senator COUZENS. We like to hear you orate. But I do not think it adds anything to it.

Under Secretary MILLS. I do not think it adds anything. I will concede that.

Senator BARKLEY. It was one of the best speeches you have made lately.

Senator WATSON. We like to hear you get earnest about it.

Under Secretary MILLS. Great Britain, through investments made over the course of 150 years, at least, the world over, even in this depressed period, has flowing to England a constant stream of foreign exchange, which is available at all times for meeting foreign obligations. She finances all her export and import trade through her own capital. In fact, London, as we all know, has been the banking center of the world for generations. Needless to say, British industries are financed by British capital, and I doubt very much whether, outside the government debt, and the city's short-term money debt, Great Britain has any outside commercial debt. Moreover, Great Britain, owing to her foreign investments, is still an enormously rich country. She was not dependent on foreign credits. She had her own capital. She could finance her own industries. She could finance her own export and import trade, and she had such financial strength that, even when she went off the gold standard, there was enough confidence in sterling so that, while it depreciated, it never collapsed, and there never was any danger of its collapsing.

That situation is not comparable to the situation of a nation that is doing business entirely on foreign credits. Moreover, you must not forget this. The people of Germany have not just approached inflation from the standpoint of theory. They have been right through inflation in its most extreme form. They have seen the savings of a lifetime wiped out. They had seen all capital in Germany wiped out. They had seen the most hideous suffering to all classes of the population as the value of their currency went down to zero. The very suggestion that the German currency should be cut away from the firm basis of gold or foreign exchange, and should once more become a paper currency, would have produced an unthinkable panic in Germany; whereas the Britisher, while he was not happy, of course, at going off the gold standard—at least most of them were not——

Senator COUZENS. Neither were his creditors, were they?

Under Secretary MILLS. Neither were his creditors. At least, they never lost faith in the pound sterling, and they were sufficiently strong to avoid, and they have avoided, the inflation that would inevitably have followed in Germany under similar circumstances.

Finally, let us remember this: Great Britain was the one country in Europe that put her currency back to the prewar standard, and in so doing, whatever benefits she derived—and they were considerable—had to be offset by the fact that she did place a very real handicap on herself in so far as competition in the world markets was concerned; and the immediate benefit, even though it be but a temporary one, was to remove that handicap and relieve that particular strain, so that while in Germany going off the gold standard would have been accompanied by wholesale unemployment, in Great Brtain the effect has been, far from increasing unemployment, to stimulate employment. I do not know to what extent. So, I do not think the situations are in any sense comparable, Senator.

I think, in a general way, that is the story. Rightly or wrongly, although I did not have any doubts in my own mind in June, I certainly have no doubts now. The action taken was absolutely necessary to avert a major catastrophe.

Senator COUZENS. I am not questioning the action of the President in this matter. What I am trying to get at is this: I understood you to say that the flight of capital from Germany was very great long before the President issued his statement—to the extent of some $800,000,000 or $1,000,000,000.

Under Secretary MILLS. Over a 7-month period.

Senator COUZENS. Yes.

Under Secretary MILLS. But most of it during the last month.

Senator COUZENS. What I am asking is this: If they had gone off the gold standard, that capital would not have been withdrawn, would it?

Under Secretary MILLS. To the extent that it could have been withdrawn, it would have been.

Senator COUZENS. But it would not have been withdrawn with the depreciated mark the same as it would have been withdrawn with the mark at par.

Under Secretary MILLS. I hate to speculate on that, but I think that if Germany, with her background and with the knowledge of her situation, had gone off the gold standard, every foreign depositor that could have gotten out would have taken his loss and gotten out.

Senator COUZENS. He could not have gotten out—that is the substance of it—because he could not have gotten out at anywhere near the value of the mark.

Under Secretary MILLS. No; he could not have.

Senator KING. Mr. Mills, my recollection is that under the Young plan, if not under the Dawes plan, Germany had the right to ask for a moratorium of three years.

Under Secretary MILLS. Two years.

Senator KING. Yes; two years. If my premise is correct, why was it necessary for the President of the United States to ask for the moratorium, if Germany, by asking for it, could have obtained it from all her creditors?

Under Secretary MILLS. But she could not, you see. It was a very limited right. That was the trouble. She had to pay the unconditional annuities under any circumstances, and she could not have done that. Moreover, even as regards the conditional annuities, it simply provided against transfer. It did not cover the fact that she actually had to pay them into the Reichsbank.

Senator HARRISON. Do you know what proportion or what per cent of the annuities are conditional and what per cent are unconditional?

Under Secretary MILLS. The total annuities run to an average of, roughly speaking, 2,000,000,000 marks, and the unconditional annuities amount to 612,000,000 marks.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Mr. Mills, I understood you to say that before the President put forth his suggestion of a moratorium he had consulted or conferred with a number of Senators and Members of the House.

Under Secretary MILLS. Yes, sir.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. And had received from them, severally, an approval of his contemplated action?

Under Secretary MILLS. That is correct.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Have you in your mind, or before you, the number of Members of the respective houses that had given their approval?

Under Secretary MILLS. Prior to the action?

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Yes, sir.

Senator KING. You are pleading estoppel in pais, are you?

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Not at all. I just wanted it in the record.

Under Secretary MILLS. I think that the President gave out the list of Senators and Representatives that he was unable to consult up until Saturday noon. I am informed that since then the total number of those who signified their approval is 276 Members of the House and 68 Members of the Senate.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Have you available the number who had given their approval before he took action?

Under Secretary MILLS. I can give you the names. I refrain from reading them.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. I do not call for that at all. I simply wanted to know for my own information.

Senator COUZENS. I was one of them. I do not want to escape any implication that I was one of them.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Nor do I.

Senator COUZENS. I am not criticizing it now. I am just trying to get at some facts.

Senator BARKLEY. Under the terms of the debt settlements with the various nations of Europe, they might at any time obtain a 2-year suspension at their own request, as I understand, under certain circumstances.

Under Secretary MILLS. That is correct, Senator, but only as to the principal of their obligations.

Senator BARKLEY. I understand. Did any of those countries make this request for the suspension prior to the time when the President issued his statement?

Under Secretary MILLS. No; they had not; and there would have been no occasion to, because——

Senator WATSON. Mr. Secretary, let me ask you a question. Suppose Congress should refuse to approve this moratorium and take this action? What would be the result?

Under Secretary MILLS. Senator, that is a tough question.

Senator WATSON. You do not need to answer it.

Under Secretary MILLS. I am going to answer it by saying that I think, to begin with, it would do irretrievable damage to the reputation for good faith of our country before the entire world.

Senator HARRISON. Would not every country say that you can not rely upon the promises of the head of the Government?

Under Secretary MILLS. I am afraid it would have that result.

I want to go just a step further. We hold, Senator WATSON, the unsecured notes of our debtors. We are not going to send battleships or armies abroad to collect these debts. We are going to rely on the good faith and the character of our debtors to meet their just obligations. In other words, we rely, for the collection of these just debts, on a moral principle; and I say to you that in my judgment, if we do not regard moral principles in dealing with our debtors, then they might well feel, at the same time, that we have given them a moral justification to default on a debt which, while legal in form, depends entirely for payment on the moral obligation raised on the part of the debtor nation.

Senator GEORGE. Mr. Mills, I inferred from your statement, which I followed very closely, that in no event could the Congress have been convened, from the 20th to the 21st of June, to have met this situation.

Under Secretary MILLS. It would have been impossible, Senator.

Senator GEORGE. Without the collapse having occurred in the meantime.

Under Secretary MILLS. The show would have been over.

Senator GORE. I do not want the statement to go unchallenged in this record, that the President of the United States, even if he obtained the written consent of every Member of the Senate and every Member of the House, can bind the American people legally or even morally. The Constitution prescribes the way in which the American people can be bound, and there is no other way. I want to make this protest at this place.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in the record.

Senator COUZENS. Mr. Mills, may I ask you at this point what will become of the money that is deposited in the New York banks on the December 15 payment? Do you know the extent of it?

Under Secretary MILLS. I do not know that any of it has been deposited.

Senator COUZENS. I saw a statement in the press to that effect.

Under Secretary MILLS. All I know is that there were rumors in the press. I never heard of any money being deposited.

Senator COUZENS. Do you know whether there has been or not?

Under Secretary MILLS. No. I would be very much surprised if there were. None of these people have collected 1 cent on the debts due them since the 1st of July.

Senator BARKLEY. Is it not possible that some of them, in order to avoid being charged with even technical default, have placed the money there, knowing that it is not going to be called for?

Under Secretary MILLS. I doubt it very much.

Senator CONNALLY. On the matter of withdrawals prior to the President's action, from German banks, have you any information as to the proportion of that which belonged to German citizens who sent it out of the country?

Under Secretary MILLS. No. That is one thing you could never measure—the flight of capital.

Senator CONNALLY. Did the German Government, until the very last, take any steps to prevent the exportation of capital by its own citizens?

Under Secretary MILLS. I would rather not say this for the record——

Senator CONNALLY. I will withdraw the question.

Senator BARKLEY. Do you know to what extent the German Government used its credit, whatever credit it had, which it might have used in payment of reparations, in fostering trade with other countries?

Under Secretary MILLS. I do not think the German Government enters into that picture at all. I do not think the German Government's credit was ever used to finance foreign trade.

Senator BARKLEY. It has been claimed recently that the German Government had been involved in the effort to extend trade with the Soviet Republic.

Under Secretary MILLS. I was just going to modify my statement by saying that they had guaranteed their own exporters up to a certain percentage of the credits granted to Russia. I think you ought to understand that situation, too. They have to-day, I think, over 5,000,000 unemployed in Germany. They are willing to export at any price, and on almost any terms, in order to keep their people at work.

Senator BARKLEY. And to any country?

Under Secretary MILLS. And to any country.

Senator BARKLEY. Is that a fallacious economic remedy or a hopeful remedy?

Under Secretary MILLS. I would not want to comment. I do not know whether the Russian creditors are good or not. I have no information.

Senator BARKLEY. I have been thinking especially of Russia. I suppose they are willing to do the same thing with any country.

Under Secretary MILLS. I think, in the long run, they will probably collect, but they are confronted with a very real situation, Senator, and they are trying to work it out as best they can.

Senator COUZENS. Has the Secretary any information as to the amount of reparations that have been paid out of taxation of the German people?

Under Secretary MILLS. All of it, of course, has been paid out of taxation in one form or another.

Senator COUZENS. I understood that all the reparations had been paid by borrowing the money from foreign countries. I think that amount of borrowings and the amount of reparations are substantially alike.

Under Secretary MILLS. Of course, you can say that they paid so much in reparations over a given period, and that during that same period German industries and States and manufacturers borrowed more than that amount.

Senator COUZENS. I do not mean the industries, Mr. Secretary.

Under Secretary MILLS. It is principally the industries. The German Government, that is, the Reich, outside of the Young and Dawes loan credits and certain short-term credits, borrowed practically nothing.

Senator REED. The Dawes plan says——

Under Secretary MILLS. But what the Senator unquestionably has in mind are the figures which have been used repeatedly in order to show where Germany obtained the foreign exchange through which reparations were transferred. Of course, if the German General Electric puts up a new factory and they borrow the money in New York on a mortgage to put up that new factory, that makes so many dollars available, and that goes into the exchange market. If Germany has to make reparation payments at that particular time, those dollars are available to make the payments, but the funds, of course, are obtained in reichsmarks, by taxation of the German people, and the loans are never used to pay the reparations, except in the case of the original Dawes loan. I think that is correct, Senator REED, is it not?

Senator REED. Yes.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. In the opening of your statement you called attention to and read the statement which the President put forth as of June 20, 1931. In your reading you omitted—perhaps properly, but why I know not—the names of those Senators and Members of the House who had approved the statement, or approved his contemplated action. In the course of that statement the President said:

"I do not approve in any remote sense of the cancellation of the debts to us."

Has he taken any action or put forth any statement which modifies the words in the statement I have just read?

Under Secretary MILLS. No; and I read it, Senator.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. To your knowledge, has the President put forth any statement, or done, or caused to be done, any act modifying or qualifying the statements made in his statement of June 20, 1931?

Under Secretary MILLS. While I hesitate to speak for the President of the United States, I think I am on safe ground when I say that he is unqualifiedly opposed to cancellation.

Senator WATSON. In his debt message a week ago to-day, Mr. Secretary, he repeated that very language.

Under Secretary MILLS. I can say, without qualification of any kind, that the Treasury Department is absolutely opposed to cancellation.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Adverse criticism having been launched at the President for the statement put forth, or the action taken as a result of his suggestion, are you aware that he consulted with or invited the opinion of Senators absent from Washington and with whom he could not confer personally?

Under Secretary MILLS. As to this proposal of June 20?

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Yes.

Under Secretary MILLS. Yes, sir. It was done by telephone and telegraph.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. I do not wish to inject my own personality into this immediate hearing, nor have anything to say touching my views upon the whole subject, but I will, for the record, Mr. Chairman, ask that there be incorporated a telegram which the President sent to me as of June 22, 1931, addressed to me at Menlo Park. It may serve to read it.

Senator HARRISON. Is that the usual telegram that was sent out to Senators?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator HARRISON. I am assuming, for the moment, that he sent a telegram of the same tenor to other Senators.

Under Secretary MILLS. I think that is a fair assumption.

The CHAIRMAN. It will go into the record.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. I want those present to hear it, if you will indulge me. Adderssing me, the President said [reading]:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1931.

Hon. SAMUEL M. SHORTRIDGE,
Menlo Park, Calif.:

You no doubt have seen my statement in Sunday's press of the proposals of the American Government in respect to postponement for one year of all intergovernmental debts. Inasmuch as the proposal is, of course, contingent upon action by Congress, and as the matter is one of national interest, having no partisan character in that light, I consulted before action the Senators and Representatives of both parties present in Washington and as many as possible who were accessible in the country. This list of generous support from Members was shown in the public statement referred to above. I regret that difficulties of communication rendered it impossible to contact with all Members of the Senate and House. I do not wish to press any Member for reply as to his views if he prefers not to give them at this time, yet if you are favorable to the proposal in the first paragraph of the statement above mentioned it would undoubtedly aid in the negotiation now in progress if you could inform me thereof.

HERBERT HOOVER.

Senator HARRISON. Of course, you answered it.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. I did.

Senator BARKLEY. Is that the same message we all got?

Senator SHORTRIDGE. I assume so.

Under Secretary MILLS. Before I go, I would like to say one thing. I assumed from conversation that took place here that you are not going to report the Senate bill, but wait for the bill to come over from the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Under Secretary MILLS. The Ways and Means Committee rather objected to the last section of the bill as granting a little too much authority to the Secretary of the Treasury. The legislative drafting bureau drafted it in that form to take care of two particular situations, Greece and Austria. Section 4 will be revised by the Ways and Means Committee. I thought this committee ought to have notice of that change. The bills will not be identical.

Senator GORE. Before Mr. Mills leaves I would like to place this statement in the record—that since the restoration of peace between the United States and Germany the German Governments, national, state, and municipal, have borrowed in the United States $798,000,000, practically all of it since the adoption of the Dawes plan, and German corporations during the same time have borrowed $407,000,000 in the United States.

Senator COUZENS. I am glad the Senator made that statement, because I did not want it to appear from the record, from what the Secretary said, that I was confused as to the private borrowings, such as the General Electric example, and the moneys borrowed by the German Government and its municipalities.

Under Secretary MILLS. Now, let us be clear. The German municipalities do not pay reparations.

Senator COUZENS. I understand.

Under Secretary MILLS. The Reich Government, outside the Lee-Higginson credit, and possibly another short-term credit, has received no money through borrowing, except through the Dawes loan and the Young loan. The Dawes loan was admittedly used to pay reparations.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I appreciate the possibility of the impatience that may be entertained by Members of the Congress who are suffering through an agony arising out of their desire to go home. But at the risk of giving possible offense to the sensitiveness of those Members of Congress, permit me to say that in my opinion the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is entitled to consideration and that if adopted it would be the messenger of peace on earth and good will toward men as we adjourn to celebrate Christmas time. Without it the joint resolution means but little. I can approach the discussion of the amendment and of the resolution quite free from any entangling alliances.

The consideration which has been given by the executive department of the United States falls far short of the consideration given by the Premier of France with respect to parliamentary duties, parliamentary obligations, and parliamentary powers. Congress adjourned on the 4th of March, 1931. All of the conditions existing respecting the political and economic condition of Europe at this time existed when the Congress adjourned on March 4. Yet, in utter disregard of those conditions, the executive department declined and refused to call the Congress into extraordinary session for the consideration not only of our foreign affairs, but as well of our domestic affairs. Instead of exercising his function, performing his duty, and calling Congress in session under the Constitution, he called into private conference behind closed doors some of those who have been characterized as "leaders" of the Congress. It is the first time in my life when I have ever known that "leaders" of Congress were to legislate for the people of the United States; and yet that is exactly what the executive department did and it is exactly what those leaders did. It was a session of Congress—improvised, of course—called at the White House, not at the seat of the Congress but at the White House, there in conference to determine what the policy of this Government should be with respect to debts due this Government in the year 1932.

I call the attention of the Senate, if you please, to the consideration that was given to the Parliament of France by the Premier of France when he notified the Government of the United States in so many words that the French Parliament was sovereign, was supreme; that its intervention was indispensable, and so the note of the French Government declared, in response to President Hoover's proposal:

> The French Government is prepared to ask the French Parliament, whose intervention is indispensable and whose decision is sovereign, that France provisionally and for a period of one year forego the retention of any payment made by the Reich.

That was the act, and properly so, of the Premier of France toward his Government and his people.

Not so with the executive department in America. First, a conference was called, and then Congress was convened by telegrams at the respective residences of Members and not at the seat of this Government—an unwarranted, an unconstitutional proceeding, which, as a Representative of the people of my sovereign State, I can not overlook, approve, or condone.

Mr. President, if the person, whether now or in the future, who occupies the Executive Office chooses to commit the Government of the United States upon a proposition as to which the Congress is sovereign and its intervention is essential, such a President could plunge America into war by calling a conference of the leaders of the respective parties in secret conference behind closed doors without the public ever receiving the information that was given that special conference. Then, to approve of that proposal, the Executive could go one step further, as was done in this case, and by telegrams call Members of Congress into session all over the United States. I need not exaggerate, I need indulge in no imagination or picture any improbable or impossible future act on the part of the Chief Executive when I say that let this practice be carried but one step farther and we shall have in America a dictatorship without and beyond and over and above the Constitution and the laws. The proceedings in the initiation of this matter, in my opinion, do not add respect or stability to the functions and powers of the executive department. It is only the second time in the history of our country, as I recall, that the President of the United States, without authority of the Constitution and without justification in law, brought the Government into a position that was bound to embarrass the Government itself and bound to embarrass the Representatives of that Government, whose constitutional duty, function, and power were to be exercised under the Constitution.

Under the practice in this case we can be drawn into war without the consent or action of Congress by men occupying the Executive Office who forget that they are not managers of a coal mine in China, by men occupying the executive department who forget that this is a government by law and not by the edict of a dictator. Under such conditions I can readily conceive how our Government can be thrust into future wars.

Personally, I have no commitments on this proposition. I received a telegram from the President substantially in the language of the telegram received by the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE]. I answered that telegram in the light I then had by sending this telegram to the President:

> Moratorium approved and I believe urgent, provided that there are no secret understandings among Allies for preferential treatment or payment of private or international bankers' loans over Government loans, and provided that there are no commitments entered into as a condition of other nations agreeing to moratorium and no suggestion of America's cancellation of foreign war loans.

As the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has so well pointed out, the joint resolution now before the Senate is not the proposition indicated to the Members of Congress by telegram. The same information was communicated to the British Government. The British Premier made his report to the Brtish Parliament. The Prime Minister informed the House of Commons on June 22 to this effect:

> President Hoover's proposal applies, however, to all—

And then within quotation marks occur the words—

> "intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts."

There was no doubt in the mind of the Prime Minister of Great Britain as to what the President's proposal was. "All intergovernmental debts" is so plain, so emphatic, that to say that this joint resolution substantially complies with the President's suggestion is almost to admit the lack of an intelligent understanding of the English language.

Moreover, the Prime Minister makes this very significant statement immediately following the paragraph I have just read:

> His Majesty's Government for their part accept this proposal in spirit as well as letter.

Moreover, the French Government well knew that the President of the United States said, not only by implication but by plain language, that he intended that all intergovernmental debts should be postponed for a year. Of course, this joint resolution does not embody the proposal of the President submitted to the Members of Congress at their respective homes by telegram. Moreover, after the proposal was modified, and modified materially—modified with respect to essential provisions—I doubt if a single Member of the Congress was advised of that modification. I have heard no Member claim that he was advised. I know that I was not advised.

Here we boast of a democracy in which we have three departments of government, each separate, distinct, and independent; which now appears, in my opinion, to be nothing more than a boast by many, with pious hypocrisy behind it. Yet in France the Premier, having regard for the constitution, having regard for the laws, having regard for the representatives of the people of France, indicated to the American Government that Parliament was sovereign in this respect, and that parliamentary intervention could not be escaped, and Parliament must first be consulted.

Yet, wholly unmindful of our own Constitution, of our own democracy, of the limitations of the laws, the limitations prescribed by tradition, and the limitations prescribed by a true democracy, notwithstanding the receipt of the French note, the executive department continued to advance the proposal, contrary, as I say, to our Constitution and contrary to the form of government under which the President exercises his functions.

Mr. President, we have three departments of government. Each one of those departments of government is supreme within its particular field. No one of those departments should trespass the field of any other department. Each department should guard zealously and jealously its functions, not because of the individuals occupying the positions in the respective departments, but because the three functions of government—executive, legislative, and judicial—are functions of government intended for the protection of the lives and the liberty and the welfare of the people; and every department of government holds within itself as trustee the liberties and the independence and the rights of the people under the Constitution; and the head of any department who transgresses that which makes possible our democracy has betrayed the trust reposed in him.

Mr. President, a Congress that lacks courage, a Congress that forgets the trust reposed in it, a Congress that fails to carry out the trust, is not entitled to the respect and eventually will not have the respect of the people for whom the Congress acts as trustee within the field prescribed by the Constitution.

This practice, as I said, is just a step toward a dictatorship. There is but one other step to take, and that step is to use the armed forces of America in carrying out the purposes of those in authority, whether they be willful, unpatriotic, disloyal, or otherwise. Just one step—the Army of the United States to enforce the dictates of the head of the Government, whosoever he may be, without justification in law or under the Constitution—and when that time comes our democracy is at an end.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. When a public official takes an oath to support the Constitution, he not only swears that he will perform the duties allotted to him by the Constitution, but he also swears that he will not engage in activities outside of that which the Constitution prescribes for him. That is, he swears that he will not overstep his authority and power.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, the oath is all-inclusive, embracing the negative as well as the positive.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield for a question.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The President has the power to negotiate treaties, has he not?

Mr. BLAINE. Of course the President has power to negotiate treaties.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly. Now, in respect to this matter, has not the President in every communication said that the carrying out of this plan was subject to the consent and approval of the Congress? Has he not said that?

Mr. BLAINE. I was coming to that proposition.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Is not that the situation as a legal proposition?

Mr. BLAINE. Let us analyze that for just a moment and see how absurd is any conclusion that the President was within the constitutional limitations.

Mr. President, America is possessed of honor. America is possessed of integrity. Whether that honor and integrity abides in public office, public officials, or not, that honesty and integrity abides in the hearts, thoughts, and consciences of our people. Now, let us analyze just where the American people have been left in this situation.

The President has called a Congress—not at the seat of government but by telegram—at the respective homes of the Members of Congress after a conference with the leaders. Then the President, having assurances, as he states, of a majority of the Congress that they will support a proposition which he has announced as a proposal to America's debtors, then proceeds to enter into an agreement with America's debtors to modify the proposal he has made to Members of Congress by telegram, and eventually that proposal goes into a contract between the debtors of America on the one hand and our Government on the other.

That contract has not been fully executed; it can not be fully executed until the Congress has acted. With America placed in the situation where its President has bound it for six months at least by a contract conceived by him and entered into by him without constitutional sanction, can we in good faith repudiate that contract for the remainder of its term?

To all intents and purposes, so far as the debtor nations were concerned, the President was the agent of America. He has entered into an agreement without authority of law. Nations were led to assume obligations which they would not have assumed except on the representation made by the American agent.

Mr. President, America's self-respect among the nations of the world must be preserved notwithstanding the dictatorship of an American agent. This may be done once but never again should Congress be placed in this dilemma.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, thanking the Senator, will he permit another question, merely to get the views of the Senator touching the powers of the President in a matter of negotiating treaties?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Let us take an ordinary treaty. I have understood that the President had the power to meet with representatives of foreign governments, meeting through the Secretary of State, it may be, and arranging a proposed treaty. But, of course, such a treaty has no validity until it is submitted to the Senate. The Senate may or may not approve. If it approves it, it becomes a treaty.

How does the Senator differentiate, and claim that in this instance the President has bound the Nation? I do not consider this Nation bound until the Senate shall approve. It may disapprove; I do not know.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, of course I know that the Senator from California is quite familiar with the Constitution of the United States, and I would not impute to him any inference with respect to any lack of knowledge in connection with some very intricate constitutional question. But it is academic that the Constitution of the United States expressly auhorizes the President to negotiate treaties.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. It ought to be obvious that the Senator's question is quite beside the mark.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Is not that this situation? Are we not right in that situation now? While we are arguing pro and con, unless it is to determine whether we will agree to this, what are we doing?

Mr. BLAINE. I have a measure of generosity toward my colleagues. I know the agony under which they may be laboring, or under which some of them may be laboring. They want to go home. I think it is hardly necessary for me to repeat time and again the proposition I have made. Surely the Senator can not contend that there is any authority in the Constitution of the United States for the President to enter into agreements with foreign governments for the cancellation of debts due America. Whatever negotiations he had, of course, were negotiations made by an agent without authority to enter into a contract and bind the Government.

Now, Mr. President, coming directly to the proposition of the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], I want to submit some observations which I think are material. Much discussion has been going on ever since last June respecting conditions in Germany. I shall not engage in any detailed statement respecting the German situation, but I think it is obvious to everyone that whatever situation was to be saved in Germany was primarily of a political character.

What threatened Germany in June was the possibility of the breakdown of the then and present German Government. Great Britain knew full well that if there were an entirely chaotic political condition in Germany, then her empire was insecure. France well knew, with the chaos which existed in some parts of Europe, that if the German Government fell, even the Parliament of France would then be upon a very unsound foundation. It was a political situation. The economic situation is an entirely different proposition.

When measured in dollars and cents, the moratorium to Germany means but little. I am not going into the details respecting that proposition. Senators have inserted in the RECORD material indicating the amount of money owed by the German Government to the Allies and to America.

I want to call attention to this one significant fact: That the German Government owed America, according to the testimony of Under Secretary Mills, of our Treasury Department, the sum of only $6,000,000 for the year 1932. That is the only amount the payment of which we forgive Germany; the payment of which we forego for one year.

Let us examine into the French situation: France did not accept the original proposition the President submitted to the Members of Congress by telegram but modified that proposition very materially. The details have been given, but I call attention to a very significant proposal of the French Government.

Germany had entered into agreements by way of treaties. One country with which Germany was closely allied was Austria—and I say "allied" because they were connected by economic and geographic similarity. Germany and Austria had engaged in several treaties. Each one of those treaties bound the German Government to harsher terms than those contained in the treaty of Versailles.

When Germany found her economic condition shattered, then she went to the governments of Europe to secure loans, or to enable Austria to secure loans, and treaties were entered into, additional obligations were assumed by Germany, and exactly the same situation is involved in this proposal. France proposes not only the security she has had heretofore, not only the guaranties under the treaties, but, in addition to those guaranties, France has demanded and will receive additional guaranties from the German Government.

Those guaranties consist of security given to the French Government for the payment of the nonpostponable reparations. That security consists of bonds upon the railways of Germany. Those bonds are underwritten by the German Government. After France has sucked almost all of the lifeblood out of Germany, she continues to demand additional security.

Let us examine into that for just a moment. The Versailles treaty was the most unconscionable treaty ever imposed upon a defeated nation after any war fought in the history of the world. The whole purpose of France, beginning with that treaty, has been to reduce Germany to the position of a dependency of the French Government, if not political dependency, at least economic dependency. France would enslave the frugal, industrious people of Germany, and place them under an economic system out of which Germany can never recover so long as the treaty of Versailles and other treaties with the Allies are in effect. What happened to Germany?

The German people, the conquered people, were despoiled of their natural resources. France demanded and received the natural resources of the Ruhr Valley. She went into the Saar Basin. Before she would withdraw her black troops of Africa from German soil she demanded additional impositions upon the German people. Germany, therefore, internally was brought to her knees economically. She had lost her coal, her iron. The basic material of her vast industrial possibilities was lost to her during the time of dire need.

Despoiled of her natural resources, her territories were taken from her. All of her territories in Africa were placed under the mandate of the French Government, the British Government, and, as I recall, a part of her African territories were placed under the mandate of the Belgian and Italian Governments. All of her possessions in the Pacific were taken from her. Her vast system of cables that were a network from Berlin to Cape Town, to Good Hope, across the Atlantic and Pacific to Australia, a network of cable lines so important to her industrial and commercial prosperity, were likewise taken from her.

Germany was despoiled of these vast territories, and Great Britain and France became the beneficiaries of that despoilment. Great Britain has attained a territory of some 13,000,000 square miles as a result of the despoilment of Germany. An area exceeding 13,000,000 square miles including the British Isles, 13,000,000 square miles of the earth's inhabitable surface, rich in natural resources, has been attained by Great Britain.

There were taken from the German people over 1,250,000 square miles of inhabitable territory, with a population of over 12,000,000 people. These vast territories are to-day largely under the mandate and thereby in the possession and under the control, practically all of them, of two governments. All those vast lands, all of their immense natural resources, were obtained under the harsh and unconscionable terms of the Versailles treaty.

What does that have to do with America? It seems to me, Mr. President, that we are confronting a world situation in which America is being placed in jeopardy. What has happened? France has erected her tariff wall. Great Britain has erected her tariff wall. Each of those nations has given preferential consideration to the nationalities under its sovereignty or under its mandates. To-day America in her commercial transactions throughout the world is denied access for her goods except by the payment of these high tariffs, within the British Empire, to over one-fourth of the inhabitable area of the world. By reason of these high tariffs and the differentials favoring those nations belonging to the respective foreign governments or over whom they have a mandate, America is denied equality of commercial intercourse.

These same nations are circumscribing America's industrial development, through the diminishing of her commerce, to a territory not beyond continental America—with Cuba, with the Philippine Islands, with Hawaii, and a few other outlying possessions like Porto Rico. Trace this situation carefully and it will be found that out of the Versailles treaty the nations to which I have referred, and primarily France and Great Britain, are restricting and circumscribing, step by step, America's future wealth and prosperity. Those nations have been able to carry on in the acquisition of these vast territories under and by virtue of the Versailles treaty.

Mr. President, so long as the Versailles treaty remains there can be no peace on earth. Germany alone is not involved. I approach this situation purely from the standpoint of America's interests. It is America's interests which are primarily involved. But there may be those who will say that America is not a party to the Versailles treaty and therefore that is none of our business. An argument to that effect might have been logical prior to the proposal that is before us; but this proposal, as I view it, and as I think the facts disclose, has made the interallied debts and reparation agreements part and parcel of America's concern.

Had the President awaited the request of the British Government or of the French Government or of the German Government for a postponement of the annuity for 1932, then I can appreciate how we might not have been involved, how we would not have been concerned respecting reparations; but that is not what the President has done. The President has submitted a proposal, modified by France, which involves a most important relationship of the American Government with reparations.

Not only that, but the President has placed this burden upon the German people with a little more vengeance. Germany is like the man who owns his home with a mortgage upon it; he defaults in the payment; the mortgagee postpones that interest and principal. But the mortgagee proposes to the home owner before he will postpone payment of the principal and interest due, the home owner must give him a chattel mortgage upon his household goods, he must give a chattel mortgage upon the small store of precious household silver that has been accumulated by the wife, he must give a chattel mortgage upon everything, loose or attached, within that household, in addition to the security already provided, that is exactly in common, plain language what France has done under this proposition. She has taken a mortgage upon the Germany railways; the bonds are underwritten by the German Government; she has additional security not only for the interest but for the principal; and through that system France can continue bleeding to death the frugal, industrious people of Germany, the young men and women who are of a generation or will be of a generation unknown to the war.

Germany has accepted the provisions, it is true; Germany has submitted to the demands of France it is true; but, Mr. President, those who understand the sad plight of a debtor realize that he must submit to whatever terms may be imposed upon him. Germany's submission, of course, was imperative on account of political conditions existing in Germany at the time this moratorium was proposed.

I, therefore, Mr. President, with some hesitancy, vote for the moratorium. I could support it more whole-heartedly if the pending amendment were adopted.

Mr. President, I think great honor is due to the able senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who has commanded the attention of the country, whose intelligent discussion of executive limitations is bound to be favorably received throughout the United States. He has performed a signal service for the people of America. That service lies in the warning he has given to future Presidents, the challenge that he has made to those who in the future would dare violate the Constitution of America. That service, in my humble opinion, will have its beneficial effect in years to come.

We are going to face this whole question of intergovernmental debts; but in the future we should face it without any prior commitments made by the President. We should face the situation from the standpoint of America's interests and the peace of the world.

Mr. President, as I have sat with the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency and listened to the testimony of bankers, domestic and international, disclose the conditions existing in this world to-day, it is as clear to me as the noonday sun that the financial structure of Europe is nothing but a shell. It may be crushed at any time overnight; and even here in America it develops from day to day through the testimony of the witnesses before that committee that our financial structure is weak, is crumbling; that we must go into the coffers of the Government to the extent of two or three billion dollars in order to save insurance companies, to save railroads, to save banks from a financial crash. So we in the United States may be facing the same crumbling financial condition that exists in Europe to-day.

I think the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] outlined what is in store for our world—not as a prophecy nor as an oracle, but through the analysis of obvious facts and applying the reasoning of all history. I heartily join in the sentiment he expressed that until we can undo the crime committed upon civilization by the treaty of Versailles there can be neither peace nor prosperity in Europe or in America.

This moratorium has been on for six months. It has only about six months to run. Then what will be the process? Another session of Congress by telegram? Another consultation of leaders of parties? Another refusal to call the Congress into extraordinary session? That will be the course if the precedent set in June is again to be followed.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. DILL. What does the Senator think would be the effect of refusing to approve the moratorium now?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, answering the Senator's question, I can only repeat what I have said—that the President of the United States acted as agent for the Government without authority either in law or under the Constitution. He entered into an agreement with the debtor nations. That agreement has not been fully executed; but the debtor nations have acted upon that agreement. They have placed themselves in positions in which they would not have placed themselves had it not been for that agreement.

When a Senator votes against the moratorium I do not want to imply that he will discredit our Nation. He has a right to vote that way. He is exercising his constitutional function. His conscience has directed his course. But the President's spokesman has announced that some 68 Senators and a large majority of the House—and the House by its action has demonstrated his announcement to be correct—are in favor of the moratorium. That is why I say that the moratorium is, and it can not be avoided.

The answer may not be satisfactory, but it is the dilemma in which we find ourselves.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin further yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. DILL. Does the Senator think that any of the nations that owe this Government would fail to pay if we refuse to approve the moratorium in the Senate?

Mr. BLAINE. Expressing a fact rather than an opinion, none of the governments has refused to pay; and I think that is the best indication that they would not have refused to pay had the President not suggested that they do not pay.

Mr. DILL. And they would not refuse to pay even yet if the Senate should refuse to approve the moratorium?

Mr. BLAINE. All of the governments, no doubt, are in a financial condition to pay so far as the Government of the United States is concerned. It is possible that they have made certain commitments. I do not know what they are. They might embarrass the governments. If the moratorium were defeated, I have no doubt that the governments that owe America are quite able to pay.

Mr. President, it was not my purpose to go into a detailed discussion of the merits or demerits of this proposal; but I did wish to point out, with as great an emphasis as possible, that the material, the most effective suggestion respecting this whole question of reparations, intergovernmental debts, and world peace is embodied in the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an editorial taken from the Wheeling Intelligencer of Wheeling, W. Va., which I ask unanimous consent to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Wheeling (W. Va.) Intelligencer of Monday, December 21, 1931]

AMERICAN BANKERS AND EUROPE'S DEBT

After reading the testimony of Charles E. Mitchell, chairman of the National City Bank of New York, before the Senate Finance Committee on Saturday, it is impossible to doubt the source of the defeatist attitude which has developed in certain American quarters of late with respect to war debts.

Mr. Mitchell was appearing in behalf of the moratorium. He did not, however, content himself with presenting arguments in favor of ratification. Not only did he paint a picture of a German people on the verge of revolt if their country is forced to make on schedule the suspended payments, but added the assertion that there is a growing "rebellion against the payment of debts" in Germany and in "other European countries." He "couldn't conceive it possible" that Germany will pay her debts, described the psychology of the German people as "readily understandable" and said that the attitude of other European peoples is similar regarding their debts to the United States.

Mr. Mitchell may not have been "preaching a doctrine of cancellation," as he hastily explained. Nevertheless, he was describing a European attitude which he and other American bankers have helped create. Moreover, considering the stake of our bankers in Europe, it is an attitude which, it is easy to believe, he would like to develop further in this country.

The Intelligencer believes sentiment in the United States is overwhelmingly against cancellation or reduction of the war debts, and rightly so. It believes Germany is able to pay reparations and the other European countries to pay war debts. It can see no connection between the two. It believes our debtors can pay us and should pay us, whatever happens to the reparations. The debts were contracted without strings. They represent actual cash borrowed from Uncle Sam, who in turn borrowed from and will have to pay the holders of Liberty bonds. Nevertheless, it is apparent that both Germany and our former allies are trying to get rid of their war obligations at our expense.

Our mistake has been to permit the feeling to develop in Europe that we are not particular about collecting the debts; that, having lopped $7,000,000,000 from the original figure in the various finding agreements, we are inclined to drop the 11 billions remaining if it will help things in Europe.

Here is where the bankers and the private individuals they represent come in. Because of attractive interest rates a great flood of American money has found its way into Europe. At the present time the amount of private foreign loans owed the American people is estimated at $15,000,000,000. In Germany alone these obligations amount to three and a half billion. Quite naturally there is some anxiety as to the security of these accounts. Indeed, Germany has frankly indicated or threatened her inability to pay off these private debts if reparations are forced upon her. And the balance of Europe, with a "similar psychology," as Mr. Mitchell says, is in about the same frame of mind. So it would be a fine thing all around for Mr. Mitchell's bank, which has, by his own admission, made $25,000,000 selling bonds of other nations in this country since 1919, for other banks in a similar position and for the individuals who hold these European bonds to have the war debts wiped off the slate.

If the purchasers of foreign bonds have gotten themselves into the position of having their money endangered unless public obligations are forgiven, it is hardly the place of the American people to rescue them. They knew or the bankers who handled the transactions knew all about the war debts and the reparations and financial conditions in Europe. They knew the money they were loaning was going to the expansion of navies, to the building up of airports and roads and other nonproductive public works. They knew there would have to be a day of reckoning some time.

The truth of the matter probably is that all European countries, including Germany, are fully able to pay all of their obligations, public and private. They may have needed the additional time granted in the moratorium. They may need still more time. But the underlying ability to pay is there. Still if the money-drunk American people can be cajoled into assuming the burden, why not let them do it? That, perhaps, is the true European attitude.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, this editorial expresses well my conclusions upon the intergovernmental-debt problem.

I was one of the Members of Congress who gave the President, by message and in oral conversation, the assurance of my support of the postponement for one year of the payment of that part of the intergovernmental debt which matured with interest this year. My assent to the proposition was based upon the conclusion that it would be of great assistance in solving the financial condition that then confronted the German Republic.

I shall vote to approve this year's moratorium, which expires on June 30, 1932. However, I shall not support an additional extension as I understand the intergovernmental debt at the present time, nor shall I vote for a reduction of the debt. Too much has already been assumed by the American people in the way of obligations growing out of the World War conflict. The financial and social burdens assumed by this country must be taken into account in figuring the cost of our assistance to Europe, as well as the services rendered by our Army, Navy, and marines on the battlefields of Europe.

In reading the combined annual report of the World War Foreign Debt Commission and the legislation leading up to the creation of this commission, I am impressed with the thought that little consideration was given by the powers that be at that time in making loans to the allied nations. Indeed, no security to the American people was given in advance for those credits, although the terms of the loans specified payment on demand. Everyone in the Treasury Department knew at that time that such a provision was a huge joke, as none of the borrowing powers could pay a billion dollars on demand; in fact, they could not pay a hundred million dollars. They were depleted because of the long-drawn-out war, which exhausted the allied nations in financial substance as well as in man power.

Mr. President, we were even technically at war with Germany and her allies until 1921, notwithstanding the treaty of peace signed at Versailles in 1919 which ended the war between Germany and the nations that were contending against her.

The year's suspension of the intergovernmental war debts was agreed to on the part of America only after President Hoover had consulted practically every Member of Congress, either personally or by wire. The overwhelming response he received in favor of it assured the President of the support of Congress, and that Congress was squarely behind him. No thought of cancellation of these obligations to our country by the allied nations was suggested by him, nor could anyone justly arrive at a conclusion that the President entertained such a thought as cancellation from any expression voiced by him, nor was it the feeling of those in Congress who assured the President of their approval and support of this suspension of the payment of that part of the principal amounting to $68,344,617, with interest of $184,222,186, or a total of $252,566,803. My conviction, and I doubt not but that it was the conviction of others, including the President, has been that this suspension would go a long way toward relieving a depression resulting primarily from the World War, that it would be of great assistance to all the nations which had intergovernmental debt obligations.

The suspension of the payment of this maturing obligation for a period of one year is not unlike the request of an individual debtor who has met with reverses and finds that he is unable to meet the principal of his obligation and asks his creditors to renew his notes and to permit him to carry on, so that sooner or later he will be able to assume and liquidate both principal and interest, if given sufficient time to do so.

Indeed, Mr. President, there is no man who has ever occupied the office of Chief Executive of this great Nation who has been confronted with the perplexing problems which the present occupant of that office has had to face. History records no one who has faced such questions in a more manly way. He has not hesitated to assume the responsibilities that have come to him, regardless of whether the best course as seen by him would appeal to the rank and file of the people. He has sought to do his duty to reach a solution of the chaotic and intricate problems which have confronted him. The problems are unprecedented, and with no similar situation in the past to serve as a guide, our President has been forced to deal with conditions more complex and strange than have beset any Chief Executive since the formation of this Republic.

We had a problem, Mr. President, after the War between the States, in which party organizations in conventions assembled took the position that the obligations contracted by the Government for the purpose of saving it could not be redeemed, and which resulted in repudiation being advocated.

If such a condition confronting our Republic caused a critical period in our financial history when $350,000,000 in greenbacks was the issue or question at that time, it may be seen that that picture is but a miniature of present conditions when we note that $330,000,000,000 represents the cost of the World War, with a sum in excess of $50,000,000,000, or more representing our part of the expenditures in that great conflict. Could there be much wonder at the financial situation which confronts us, and the same condition which at the present time confronts other nations who engaged in that war.

Indeed, Mr. President, if we take history as our guide, the situation before us at the present time, from an economic point of view, is only in keeping with a normal sequence that necessarily must follow such an orgy as began in August, 1914, and ended when the armistice was signed November 11, 1918.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss either the pending joint resolution or the pending amendment. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Tulsa World which represents my views and which was published when the moratorium was sprung upon us.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Tulsa Daily World, Thursday, June 25, 1931]

OKLAHOMA SOLONS OPPOSED TO HOOVER MORATORIUM PLAN—"CHARITY SHOULD BEGIN AT HOME," SAYS GORE—THOMAS VIEW SAME

While President Hoover's suggestion for a 1-year moratorium of European war debts would be beneficial abroad, United States Senator T. P. GORE, Democrat, is unwilling at present to accept it unless there was a stronger guaranty that this country would share in the benefits.

"The success of the suggestion depends to a considerable extent on whether those countries make the most of the opportunity to regain their economic equilibrium or spend the money thus saved on increased armaments. The United States will bear the brunt of the suspension, hence it is vitally necessary for this country to safeguard its interests.

"Charity should begin at home and the Government should not forget our own people while trying to relieve those abroad. The foreigners will feel grateful for the moment, but it is not likely that this will last long. It seldom does."

Senator GORE, who was reached at Ada by telephone, believes that a conference should be called and each foreign nation pledge itself to reduction of armaments before the moratorium aid be given.

He said "there can be no real prosperity while taxpayers are so heavily burdened with military establishments. The tariff also must be revised downward before trade can revive to any great extent. Most nations have surrounded themselves with high-tariff walls that are proving ruinous, and these must be lowered if trade is to be given a chance to revive and reach its former proportions."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I also wish to have printed in the RECORD two letters from a prominent citizen of my State, which shed an interesting light upon this joint resolution and upon the situation in the country.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., December 19, 1931.

Senator T. P. GORE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR GORE: Labor suffered a loss of $9,600,000,000 in income in 1930. Labor sustained a loss of $12,000,000,000 in income in 1931. There has been a loss in the income of executive salaries and profits during the years 1930 and 1931 of $9,000,000,000. We have suffered a loss of $4,000,000,000 in rentals during 1930 and 1931. Loss in corporation earnings and dividends during the same period amounts to $9,000,000,000. This makes a grand total of $43,600,000,000 of loss to labor and in rentals, profits, salaries, earnings, and dividends.

In addition to the above stupendous loss there has been a much greater loss in our national wealth. We have lost $185,000,000,000 of our total national wealth. The depression has cost us approximately one-half of our national wealth in addition to the staggering losses above enumerated.

The recorded debts in the United States amount to about $160,000,000,000. Other debts not recorded will run the total debts of all the people of the United States to $200,000,000,000. We owe as much as all the wealth in the United States to-day is worth.

At any rate, we have Hoover and other Republican leaders for the past several years to thank for our present chaotic circumstances. Yet Hoover thinks we are able to donate to Europe this year $250,000,000 by reason of the moratorium and ultimately to cancel the $12,000,000,000 in loans European countries owe us, all of which to help international bankers and foreign investors.

Yours very truly,

R. M. MCCOOL.

OKLAHOMA DEMOCRATIC STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE,
Oklahoma City, Okla., December 17, 1931.

Senator T. P. GORE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR GORE: The people of this State are against Hoover's moratorium. They believe that charity should begin at home. We have spent about $38,000,000,000 by reason of the World War. In addition, we loaned European countries about $12,000,000,000. On top of all this private interests have invested fifteen or more billion dollars in foreign countries, principally in European countries, during the last 10 years. All this makes a total around sixty-five to seventy billion dollars that Europe has cost us in the last 15 years. That is more money than all those countries are worth. This explains, too, where our money and credit have gone.

The moratorium will cost the United States this year $250,000,000. That money would satisfy much want and relieve much suffering in this country. Recently nearly all the towns and cities throughout the United States put on a Community Chest campaign and collected millions of dollars for the poor and unfortunate. Under the circumstances that was a splendid thing to do. Just now we are putting on an old-clothes campaign. That is a fine thing to do. But both the Community Chest campaign and the old-clothes campaign are a reflection upon and an indictment of our financial and industrial system.

Our people are starving because we have too much food. Their backs are bare because we have too many clothes. Their heads are unsheltered because we have too many buildings. This chaotic and deplorable condition comes about because of improper, unfair, and unjust distribution, made possible by exorbitant, and what should be unconscionable, profit-taking in periods of so-called prosperity. Centralization of our money and credit, resulting necessarily in the control of wealth by a comparatively few, fosters and accentuates these conditions. Rather than keep purchasing power in the hands of the American consumers, in whom lies the greatest potential market on earth, our industrial overlords, international bankers, and foreign investors have invested abroad the fortunes that the American people as consumers made it possible for them to exact from society. This group evidently believes that we must first save other countries and then save ourselves.

As I write this letter, snow is falling and melting as it hits the ground. It is cold and penetrating. I see ill-clad and poorly fed people on the streets. I am told they are digging dugouts for the winter in North Canadian bottoms. The months of suffering have begun. Our people have so far tolerated the almost unbearable conditions, but their patience is now gone and their hopes of better times and conditions have been blasted. I dread the next few months, because I am fully aware of what may happen.

Verily, verily, as the Bible would say, charity and justice should begin at home.

Yours very truly,

R. M. MCCOOL,
Chairman.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, while I am on my feet I will merely add that, in my judgment, this measure is a mere opiate. It is not an antidote.

It deals with symptoms and not with causes.

It does not lay the ax at the root of the tree of evil.

It does not eradicate the existing evil. It may, indeed, aggravate that evil. It may have already excited hopes which are destined to be shattered in the future.

I agreed with the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] when he said that our country had been exceedingly generous to our associates in the late war. This country has been exceedingly generous to our recent associates, both in the reduction and in the postponement of their debts. Our generosity, I think, is as unprecedented as it is unappreciated, and I sometimes think we ought to be just to the folks at home before we become generous to the strangers across the sea.

I admire the fine chivalry, I admire the fine sentiments expressed by the junior Senator from California when he said that our associates in the war—come what may—will pay their debts—the uncanceled remnants of their debts. I admire that fine sentiment, but I do not share his "simple faith."

If some curious antiquarian of the future should do us the honor to ransack the records of this day, I wish him to note that there was one doubting Thomas, one realist, who did not share this illusion.

To my mind there is nothing more fatuous than the fancy that 30 or 40 or 50 years from this day Germany will be making reparation payments to France. Reparation payments are in the nature of a fine. They are based upon war guilt or upon alleged war guilt. They grow out of a treaty that was penned with the sword and that was signed at the point of the bayonet. Whether right or wrong, Germany does not feel in conscience bound to keep that treaty, or bound to make those payments; and the day will come, whether Hitlerism or communism comes to power in Germany, when these reparation payments will be repudiated. Whether better or for worse they will be repudiated.

The debts owing by the allied powers to the United States rest upon an entirely different principle. They are different in law, they are different in morals, they are different in conscience. They will not be found to be different in practical effect; and this joint resolution has linked them together indissolubly and has reversed established policy in this country that there was no relationship between reparation payments on the part of Germany to France and the debts owing to this Government by the allied powers, which represent, not a fine, but money had and received, which represent values advanced to the allied powers, which represent the money which they received and accepted and which preserved their existence.

Yet when Germany repudiates her obligations, if she does, then the allied powers will default their obligations to the United States, although they owe their very existence to those obligations. France made it plain when she ratified the Berenger-Mellon agreement that she would not pay unless she was paid.

I do not favor this joint resolution. I do not favor the cancellation of these debts. I do not favor the reduction of these debts. The governments that borrowed this money ought to repay it. Our Government did not use the money and our people should not have to pay it. Yet I am not blind, as I believe, to what the future holds in reserve—nor to a movement which will prove to be as resistless as time and tide. However, I think there is an advantage, notwithstanding that, in the United States adopting and adhering to the ultimatum "Pay or repudiate."

If the allied powers pay, we get the money and they save their credit. If they do not pay, they forfeit their credit, but perhaps it may save trusting governments in the future, our own included; it may save them money in the days which are to come.

Let Senators remember that when Augustus Cæsar gathered into his hands all the powers of the Roman Government he preserved, indeed, the trappings of the Republic. But free government and Roman liberty were extinct. I do not think the Congress is bound by the pledges made, and I hope that this experience will warn us against similar experiences in the future.

The governments of Europe have, at least, an elementary knowledge of our Constitution, of our free institutions, and how they function. They know how, and how alone, the people of this great Republic can be bound. I assume that our President is likewise familiar with the fundamental principles of our free institutions and of the Government over whose destiny he has been called to preside.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Hawes	Robinson, Ind.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. BARKLEY. My colleague the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] is unavoidably detained on account of necessary business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, two things have amazed me throughout this discussion; first, the haste with which this proposition is attempted to be forced through the Senate and, second, the fact that none of the acknowledged administration leaders have stood up on this floor in support of a measure which unquestionably is going to pass with a large majority. I do not know why this haste is necessary, but so far as I am personally concerned, I am willing to submit myself to the decision of my leaders and confine my remarks to the very briefest explanation of the motives which induce me to vote as I shall vote.

In the first place, I wish to say that there is no Senator on this floor who is more thoroughly opposed than I am to the method of voting by Western Union telegram. The message which I personally received came to me when I was in a remote district of my State and before I had had a chance even to read the President's initial statement. I answered it, but I answered it in terms which I do not believe bind me in any way at the present time. I do not know whether the Republican leader has me on the list of 68 Senators or not, but I will say that even had I committed myself at that time I should not feel that a statement of my attitude in June bound me in any way to a totally different kind of moratorium in December.

Second, I want to say that I do not subscribe to the facile optimism which has been voiced by a good many Members on this side of the Chamber. I quote merely as an example what the Republican floor leader said yesterday—that this proposal had "nothing to do with debt cancellation, with debt reduction, with debt postponement, with future moratoriums, or with any other question relating to our international relations."

We have been referred to section 5 as a guaranty that never in the future would Congress be called upon to do anything of this sort again. I submit what every Senator in this Chamber knows—that section 5 is not binding on future Congresses, and that in essence it is not worth the paper on which it is written. I can not adopt such an unreasonable optimism. I can not lay such flattering unction to my soul.

I believe that one note of reality has been struck in this whole discussion, and that note was struck by the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. I believe that the analysis of the situation by the Senator from California was entirely correct. I differ with him only in the course which I think should follow from those assumptions. The Senator from California stated that this is the opening wedge. I agree with him. That is one reason which leads me to vote for this resolution, because I believe ultimately it is the opening wedge which will split apart the hypocritical plan by which the world has been allegedly run for a good many years—the Young plan, the Dawes plan, and the very Versailles treaty itself.

I do not often subscribe to anything which comes from international bankers. Especially rarely do I have the honor to agree to anything said by Mr. Otto H. Kahn. But when Mr. Kahn said that it would be better for this country to have reparations and war debts all torn up and thrown into the sea I believe that he was stating the truth.

I have sometimes wondered, Mr. President, whether this whole scheme of war debts could be supported in its origin. I have often wondered whether this country might not well have adopted as its policy the policy which Great Britain carried out so successfully during the Napoleonic wars—the policy of subsidizing its allies for what war expenses they were unable to pay themselves. I have an idea that if such a policy had been followed by this country during the World War we should have avoided not only the complications which face us now but a great part of the distress which is universal and which particularly affects the people of this country. Can anyone point to an American citizen, a business man, a farmer, a laborer, an unemployed citizen, who can say with any degree of truth that this fiction of war debts is improving his own personal status? I do not believe there is one.

However, Mr. President, that is not a matter which we have to consider now. These war debts are in effect. We have canceled many of them. My only criticism is that in canceling them the United States had to give everything without getting anything in return.

I believe that this debate and the vote which will undoubtedly be taken in favor of this moratorium will in themselves compel a speedy readjustment of European affairs and affairs throughout the world. If I did not think so, I would not vote for this joint resolution. It is needless to say that I shall vote for the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL]. I suppose that amendment is doomed; and if and when it fails I shall vote for the moratorium on the theory which I am endeavoring to state.

The fact that this country has given everything without anything in return does not mean, Mr. President, that in the future we should continue that futile policy. I believe every Senator on the floor in his heart knows that the main troubles in the world to-day are due to the Versailles treaty with all its ramifications. I do not necessarily blame those who at the time may have agreed to that treaty on the theory that they could get nothing better, but surely, Mr. President, in the time which has gone by since 1919 there have been innumerable occasions for the nations of the world to get together and adopt something more adequate to the situation.

We have heard the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] speaking this afternoon, and every Senator on this floor knows that as long as Europe is an armed camp—and it will continue to be an armed camp so long as there is no revision of the Versailles treaty provisions—so long this country also will have to spend an enormous proportion of its annual expenditures for unproductive purposes.

I think, Mr. President, that this is the first step in a process of world adjustment; I think that the Versailles treaty is going to be revised, not primarily by anything which we can do, but primarily by the logic of facts; and I think it is going to be revised a great deal sooner than most of us imagine.

It is my hope that at that early date we shall have in the White House a man of the intellectual integrity, of the sincere patriotism, and of the devotion to American ideals possessed by the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], against whom I shall on at least one occasion be compelled to cast my vote.

Mr. President, I am going to vote for the Howell amendment; and whether that amendment is carried or fails, I shall vote for the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. WATSON and Mr. NORRIS called for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 24, after "United States," it is proposed to insert a semicolon and the following:

> Nor shall such agreement be made with any government until it shall have effectively assented, in a form and manner satisfactory to the President, to the reformation of the Versailles treaty, including the return to the German Government of its former but now mandated colonies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I have a pair for the evening with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). My colleague [Mr. HOWELL] is detained from the Chamber on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. If my colleague were present, upon this question, he would vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], who is detained at home on account of illness. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. If he were present he would vote "nay," and if I were permitted to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I understand if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MOSES. My colleague [Mr. KEYES] is unavoidably absent on business of the Senate. If present, he would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE]. I understand that on this vote, if present, he would vote "nay." As I intend to vote the same way, I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] are both detained from the Senate on account of illness. Were they present, they would both vote "nay" on this amendment.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 63, as follows:

YEAS—16

Blaine	Cutting	La Follette	Nye
Brookhart	Dill	Lewis	Schall
Bulow	Frazier	Norbeck	Wagner
Copeland	Johnson	Norris	Wheeler

NAYS—63

Ashurst	Barbour	Borah	Byrnes
Austin	Barkley	Bratton	Capper
Bailey	Bingham	Broussard	Caraway
Bankhead	Black	Bulkley	Carey
Connally	Harris	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Coolidge	Harrison	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Costigan	Hastings	McNary	Townsend
Dale	Hatfield	Morrison	Trammell
Dickinson	Hawes	Moses	Tydings
Fess	Hayden	Patterson	Vandenberg
Fletcher	Hebert	Reed	Walcott
George	Hull	Sheppard	Walsh, Mass.
Glass	Jones	Shortridge	Walsh, Mont.
Glenn	Kean	Smith	Watson

NOT VOTING—16

Couzens	Keyes	Oddie	Shipstead
Davis	Logan	Pittman	Stephens
Gore	Metcalf	Robinson, Ark.	Swanson
Howell	Neely	Robinson, Ind.	Waterman

So Mr. HOWELL's amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have another amendment which I desire to offer on behalf of my colleague [Mr. HOWELL].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 15, after the period, it is proposed to insert the following:

> It is hereby further declared that no further postponement of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States shall be considered by Congress unless and until the European nations indebted to the United States on account of prearmistice war loans shall have effectively assented, in a form and manner satisfactory to the President, to the reformation of the Versailles treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to submit only a few words in explanation of the amendment. Senators will observe, perhaps, that it is somewhat similar to the one that has just been voted upon. I desire to call attention to the difference. The amendment now offered does not apply to the present moratorium; the amendment is intended to come in the joint resolution immediately after section 5 and refers to future moratoriums only. It does not go any further than simply to provide that as to future moratoriums—it has nothing to do with the one we are now considering, but that as to future moratoriums, if there shall be any, "no further postponement of the indebtedness of foreign countries to the United States shall be considered by Congress unless and until the European nations indebted to the United States on account of the prearmistice war loans shall have effectively assented in a form satisfactory to the President to the reformation of the Versailles treaty." It does not attempt to go into any detail as to the Versailles treaty. It says nothing about the mandates. It has no application to anything but a future moratorium.

Unless there are some questions, Mr. President, I think that explains the difference between the amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Nebraska on behalf of his colleague [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). Repeating the same announcement as on the preceding vote, I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], who is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. I understand, however, that if he were present he would vote "nay." Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I repeat my announcement that I am paired for the evening with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. He left no statement as to how he would vote on this question. I withhold my vote.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). Repeating the announcement of the pair of my colleague, I desire to state that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. MOSES (when Mr. KEYES's name was called). Repeating the announcement of the unavoidable absence of my colleague, I wish to say that if he were present he would vote "nay" on this proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Again announcing my general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], and not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], who, if present, would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BARKLEY. My colleague [Mr. LOGAN] is necessarily absent from the Senate. I am not authorized to make any announcement as to how he would vote on this amendment.

Mr. FESS. I repeat the announcement in reference to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], that if he were present he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 63, as follows:

So the amendment offered by Mr. NORRIS for Mr. HOWELL was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment:

At the end of line 24, page 2, add the following:
"'Reparations,' as used in this section, means conditional and unconditional reparations."

I do that in order to make this joint resolution conform to what the President of the United States said it was.

I offer the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous roll call as to my pair with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE]. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I withhold my vote on account of my previously announced pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). My colleague [Mr. HOWELL] is detained from the Senate on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. MOSES (when Mr. KEYES's name was called). Again announcing the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. KEYES], I desire to say that if he were present he would vote "nay" on this proposal.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 66, as follows:

So Mr. JOHNSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think I ought to advise the Senate that as soon as this matter is disposed of I propose to report from the Committee on Appropriations the concurrent resolution for adjournment.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I now move the adoption of the amendment which I sent to the desk earlier in the afternoon. I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, after line 15, insert the following:
"SEC. 6. Be it further resolved, That the Federal land banks be, and hereby are, authorized and ordered to enter into agreements with such borrowers from the said banks as desire such an opportunity to postpone the payment of any amount payable during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1931, by such borrower to the said banks. Each such agreement shall provide for the payment of the postponed amounts, with interest and installments to be arranged on the same basis as are the interest and installment arrangements afforded in the agreements with those countries named in section 1 of this resolution. Where a postponement of payments by borrowers shall make it impossible for the land banks to meet their obligations to bondholders, the Treasury of the United States shall advance to the land banks such funds as may be required not exceeding the total amount of payments postponed."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. NYE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I expect to vote against this amendment, although I am very much in favor of some character of legislation at an early date that will give some relief to persons who are unable to meet their installment payments to Federal land banks. The House has already passed a bill that seeks to strengthen the land banks with a provision which the committee is now working upon to broaden that will assure that relief. It is because of that fact, and the fact, too, that such legislation attached to this proposal may delay or defeat both propositions. I am going to vote against the Senator's amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the proposition of not favoring an amendment on one bill and favoring it on another one that is not here, is a proposition with which we have been familiar for some time.

It will be remembered that in the last Congress we had before us a farm bill, now known as the Federal farm marketing act. It was President Hoover's bill for the relief of suffering agriculture in the United States. When that bill was before the Senate I offered an amendment, and it was agreed to by the Senate, providing for what is known as the debenture plan for the relief of agriculture.

The Senate agreed to the amendment. It went to the House of Representatives, where it was rejected. In conference the Senate conferees receded, and the argument made, not only in the debate but over the country and by the conferees, was that the proper place for that kind of an amendment was not on that particular bill; that we were going to have a tariff bill coming along pretty soon, and that the proper place for that kind of an amendment was on the tariff bill, because it dealt somewhat with the tariff.

I was one of the conferees. We battled over that for more than a week, and we were continually met with the argument, "This is not the right place for that amendment. We will get it when we get to the tariff bill. We are all anxious to relieve the farmer." Many of them said, "We are for this proposition. We are willing to suffer and die for the farmer, but we do not want to suffer and die on this bill. Save it for another one."

It finally went out. The tariff bill came along, and I offered the amendment again to the tariff bill, the Senate agreed to it again, and it went to conference, the House having rejected it. The amendment was rejected by the conference committee, and one of the arguments used was, "This is not the right place for that—on a tariff bill." Others had forgotten about their willingness to suffer and die for the benefit of the poor farmer, and the amendment was taken out of the tariff bill and passed out into the cold.

Now we have a proposition extending a moratorium to European nations which owe us money, and we even inaugurate it. We say to them, "You are hard up. Do not pay us now. Keep your money. Build some more ships with it. Equip a bigger army. Build up a couple of big navy vessels, each of you, and use this money which you owe us. We will wait."

Out over our country, through the South particularly, and through the West, farmers are losing their homes. They are harder up than the people in any European nation. Some of them have raised a crop, and those who have raised a crop can not sell it for any money. It is not worth anything. They can not pay their mortgages. They owe the money practically to the United States Government. It does not amount to nearly as much as the interest we are postponing now to foreign countries who owe us money.

It is proposed now that we treat the suffering farmers of the United States on the same basis on which we are going to treat our creditors over in Europe, and we are told, "This is not the place for a farmers' moratorium. This is not the bill on which we should give relief to the American farmer. We are now helping the farmers of Europe. We are now voting to give a moratorium to the European nations in order that they may build some more battleships. But do not try to help the American farmer. It is not the right time and this is not the proper place. Let him go."

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if there ever was an amendment which was applicable to the subject matter under consideration, this is that amendment, and God knows, and we know, that there are no people under our flag who are suffering as are our farmers. They have toiled, they have worked, they have sweat; their crops have been blasted, or, if they have raised crops, they are not able to get enough for them to pay the expenses of the production of the crops.

Many of them will have to be kept like those who are out of employment, by some instrumentality of charity. Some of them are now being kept that way. Many more will be in that condition before the cold winter's blasts will be past and spring shall come again.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if we want to do justice to the farmers who owe us money, we should say to them, "We will give you a moratorium."

They are not like the European nations, many of which had the money to pay what they owed. My colleague stated on the floor of the Senate that one of them had actually paid what was due on the 15th of December, and that it was now in the hands of the Secretary of the United States, being held awaiting the action of Congress, and when that action is announced it will be returned.

Many of our farmers are pleading for a moratorium. I could fill the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with letters and petitions asking for time. I see one of my friends from the southern part of the United States now honoring me with his attention. I have heard from his lips the story of suffering among the farmers in his State. I have heard such stories from Senators on this side. Foreclosures are being made to collect when it is known in advance the farmers can not pay. While we are postponing debts where the debtors can pay, we are refusing to postpone debts to our own people where they can not pay.

Throughout portions of the West the papers are filled with advertisements of sheriffs' sales, the filing of petitions in bankruptcy, the foreclosing of mortgages on the homes of American citizens. If we refuse to foreclose, they will not be able to build battleships; some of them will not even be able to live through the winter without help, and all without any fault of their own. They have not had money to squander for worse than useless things as these nations whose debts we propose to postpone have.

It strikes me that here is the opportunity, if we want to treat our farmers with the same liberality with which we treat our creditors across the water; this is the place, and now is the time to do it.

If this amendment is agreed to, some money will be required from the Treasury of the United States, perhaps, to pay the interest on the bonds which are to be issued; but that interest will not be a tithe in amount compared with the $250,000,000 which we are extending to foreign nations.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I am driven to wonder whether the Senator from Nebraska has concluded that the chances of the farmers enjoying something under this joint resolution would be in any wise improved if they would pledge themselves to spend what they would be excused from paying immediately for battleships.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I referred a few minutes ago to the fact that these farmers have not lost their money, they are not in this condition of being unable to pay, because they have been building battleships or expending their money for useless purposes.

It is conceded that the very foundation of our civilization, agriculture, has been sick for more than 10 years. Some of it is decaying, and when the condition which confronts the civilized world shall have passed, when the leveling process takes place, as it will eventually, we will see then that millions of our farmers now owning homes, the heads of families, will become tenants. Their land will be owned by the millionaire class.

We have already gone so far toward the concentration of wealth within a few hands that, as shown by the returns of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the net incomes of 504 men and women in the United States are practically equal to the total value of al' the wheat crop and all of the cotton crop produced in the United States in 1930. The gross income of the wheat farmer and the cotton farmer was just equal to the net income of 504 men and women.

Does not that teach us a lesson? Are we not reaching the point where the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few is going to crush the life out of the millions who do not have the wealth? Yet at the bottom of it all is the American farmer. He has been suffering longer than the business man, longer than the laboring man.

We told you 10 years ago that if you would not bring relief to the American farmer you could not expect the producers of our foods to remain in a condition where the cost of production is more than they could get for their products without eventually bringing down upon them, and with them, the entire structure of our civilization. That time has nearly arrived. Men in all walks of life are now in the terrible throes of this awful depression. Now we have a chance to treat the American farmer on the same basis that we propose to treat the European nations—the American farmer who has not sinned, the American farmer who has not gotten into the condition in which he now finds himself on account of any fault of his own. All we ask is that he be treated as well as the European nation that is in the condition it is now because of its own extravagance, because of its own useless and wicked expenditures in preparation for another great war.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, the fallacy of the Senator's argument seems to me to consist in the assumption that farmers owe the United States Government anything. The moratorium is a proposition to postpone debts due to the United States by the foreign countries named. I would concur in every word he uttered in support of the amendment if it were true that the farmers, in the depressed times in which we find ourselves, were indebted to the United States; but they are not so indebted and therefore I do not think his analogy can stand the test of reason.

We are proposing to do something for the farmers of the very character which the Senator so eloquently demands shall be done. The House of Representatives has already passed a bill and it is before the proper committee of this body, doing in an orderly and I think intelligent way, exactly what he demands shall be done.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MORRISON. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I want to correct the statement of the Senator from North Carolina. The House passed a bill authorizing an appropriation of $100,000,000 for the Federal land and stock banks, but not for a moratorium.

Mr. MORRISON. I think the Senator is mistaken. The provision of the bill is not satisfactory to me, and I shall advocate an improvement in it with all the zeal I can command, but it does provide for increasing the capital of the farm land bank to double the amount with which it was first set up. It is further provided in the bill as follows:

> Each Federal land bank is authorized, when in the judgment of the directors conditions justify it, to extend, in whole or in part, any installment or installments upon any mortgage that may be unpaid, and to accept payment of such unpaid installment or installments during a period of five years or less thereafter, to be paid in equal amounts in addition to the regular installments to become due during such period.

That bill has passed the other House and is before this body. I think it ought to be amended by providing, "And for the purpose of carrying out this provision $25,000,000 is authorized to be used by the Treasury," because this bank is a bank and while the United States Government, under the leadership of the great Democratic President who last served us, provided the capital to authorize this bank and set up its machinery. It has its money back. It is a legal entity, and contracts with it are just as private as with any other private banking company in the Republic.

But on account of the distressed condition of the farmers and because they, as other classes, find themselves unable to finance themselves, the House of Representatives passed this measure doubling the capital of that bank, and under its provisions, if they can sell the bonds, they can find a billion dollars in new capital to loan the farmers of the country. The capital of the land banks ought not to be consumed or diminished by a moratorium, but the Government ought to provide a special fund, in my judgment and in the judgment of many other Senators, some of them members of the Banking and Currency Committee, that will enable them to grant these extensions or moratoriums to the farmers.

I think we are on the way to doing in full and splendid measure what the Senator from Nebraska demands. I hope that this great and beneficent movement, now in concrete form and before this body, will not be destroyed by a premature and, in my judgment, almost unprecedented effort to fix a banking bill touching the very foundation of this great land-bank system, the preservation and life of which is so important to agriculture in this country, by an amendment like this tacked onto a great patriotic movement on the part of this Nation to extend to the distressed nations indebted to it a postponement for a short while of their indebtedness to us. I think it would be an excrescence upon the pending measure which ought not to be placed there and which would not help the farmers and would not in any measure benefit anybody. I hope it will be voted down.

When the proper time comes, and it will soon, I would be willing to miss my Christmas dinner, to say nothing of a vacation, to have this House bill enacted into law with an amendment that would furnish the land banks the money with which to grant a moratorium to all distressed farmers who owe the banks money.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator has answered his own argument. He says we must not put the moratorium on this measure because the moratorium is dealing with a bank, a legal entity, and then he reads a bill which offers the same moratorium through the instrumentality of that same legal entity. If we can not grant a moratorium on the pending resolution because we are dealing with a legal entity, then we can not grant a moratorium or compel a moratorium in the very bill that he recites and reads to us.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. MORRISON. The Senator seems to misunderstand my argument. I said that the farmers do not owe the money to the United States. They owe it to the bank, and if we want the bank to grant them a moratorium, we ought to give the bank the money with which to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; and we propose in the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to pay the interest that will become due on the land-bank loans or bonds that have been issued. That is done by this amendment. But it is just as bad to put this amendment on another bill as it would be on this measure. It strikes me, Mr. President, that when we are dealing with moratoriums we ought to finish with moratoriums. If we have a right to pass the bill to which the Senator has referred, then for the same reason we can adopt this amendment. If we can not do anything in the way of this farm land bank aid, then we will be unable to do it when his bill comes up. If that is correct, what a terrible catastrophe it would be, because the Senator from North Carolina would have lost his Christmas dinner. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to detain the Senate long and shall not do so. I am in full sympathy with the purpose of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] with reference to granting Federal aid to the land banks so they may in turn grant it to the farmer. I do not believe, however, it ought to be added on to this measure if we desire to do it. I am not certain that the language contained in the amendment would accomplish the purpose we might desire. Besides that, to-morrow a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency is to hold a meeting to act upon all these measures and especially the measure which has passed the House of Representatives dealing with the whole land-bank problem.

I have no doubt that whatever date we may set for our reassembling after the holidays the Committee on Banking and Currency will be ready to report a bill covering the whole situation to be dealt with on its merits and independently of any other measure, and for that reason I think it unwise to add this amendment to this particular measure and thereby possibly complicate not only the moratorium situation but the land-bank situation as well.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] proposed to grant a moratorium to all farmers who were borrowers from the Federal farm loan banks. It is very general in its terms, and includes the whole United States. It is not limited to the crop-failure areas. I shall vote against granting a moratorium to the European nations who are indebted to this country. I do this partly because I believe that a general moratorium is the beginning of the end. One request for extension will follow another one until the moral responsibility is lost. We are granting extensions to those who can pay and to those who can not pay. It is too broad.

This amendment should not be considered farm relief, for only a small part of the farmers are borrowers from the farm loan system—I think about 12 per cent; and out of those 12 per cent a majority are able to make their payments. The distress in my State, and other States in the Northwest, is general, on account of the worst crop failure since the settlement of the country, and it would be a splendid thing if moratoriums could be granted on payments due and about to become due. But I would not call it farm relief; the term is too broad.

Nothing is farm relief except a better price for all the farmer sells—a better exchange value for his commodities—in other words, something for his labor. This will not only bring prosperity on the farm but it will bring it to the industrial centers also. We are still at the wrong end. Additional credit schemes are only temporary help. The farmer has borrowed more than he is able to pay now.

It has been suggested that the bill which has passed the House, providing for additional capital for the farm-land banks, will in effect meet this situation of granting moratoriums. It does propose to grant extensions where they are necessary. So far, so good. I think this is sound in principle.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. In the moratorium there is nothing about ability to pay on the part of European governments.

Mr. NORBECK. But the Senator will not vote for this moratorium.

Mr. FRAZIER. No; and I am not going to vote for it unless we give the farmer the same relief that it is proposed to give to the European nations.

Mr. NORBECK. For the information of the Senate I will state that the bill which has passed the House carries a provision which was not in the bill when first drafted. This amendment is, in effect, an effort to place a double liability on the stockholder of the farm-loan bank. The farmer borrower is also the stockholder, for 5 per cent of his loan is retained by the farm-loan system, for which stock is issued. Now it is proposed to withhold the promised dividend until such a time as the surplus is equal to the capital. It is proposed to change the contract that he entered into, and change it without his consent. It proposes to put an additional burden upon him. If the House insists on this provision, the bill, to my mind, will be of limited value.

I do not like this amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota. It is not the best kind of a plan, but, in view of the uncertainty of securing moratoriums for those farmers who are unable to make their payments this year in the area where crops have failed, I shall support the amendment offered.

I would like it much better if the Senator from North Dakota would limit his amendment to the area where crops have failed, to those farmers who are unable to make their payments. Will not the Senator do it?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes.

Mr. NYE. Would not the Senator be quite content if the amendment were changed to provide that this aid or this moratorium shall be granted to such borrowers as may request it?

Mr. NORBECK. No; almost all the borrowers will request it.

Mr. NYE. I do not think that is altogether fair, although it might be true to some extent. There are, however, farmers who are as thorough as is the most thorough business man, and they would welcome the opportunity that might be afforded them to reduce their own debts, if they could, rather than to carry on and take advantage of a moratorium.

Moreover, Mr. President, if we were going to limit the amendment to the drought area, at once there would be a never-ending squabble over the question of where that drought line began and where it ended. I do not see how the provision could be properly administered with such a restriction.

Mr. NORBECK. The Senator must realize that there is a penalty connected with a plan of this kind. When we grant moratoriums we have started something. Here is a farm-loan system that is functioning to some extent; it is helping thousands of farmers. I do not like to break it down, even though one can make a very good defense for a movement of that kind, as he can for a good many things in times like these.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Dakota a question?

Mr. NORBECK. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not understand, Mr. President, that the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is pending before the Banking and Currency Committee. I have attended every meeting of that committee, and I think both the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] are mistaken in claiming that we are considering that proposition at all. The proposition we have before the Banking and Currency Committee is one to raise $2,000,000,000 to help the railroads, the banks, the insurance companies, and institutions of that kind. There is not a thing before it designed to help the farmers.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Iowa certainly knows that there is a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee dealing with the whole farm-loan bank situation; that the bill which passed the House the other day has been referred to the Banking and Currency Committee and is one of the bills to be considered to-morrow by the subcommittee on the Banking and Currency Committee which has been appointed for that purpose.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes, sir; but that is the bill to which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] referred and that is a different proposition.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes——

Mr. BROOKHART. It is different from the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE].

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no contention here that the amendment in the form of a bill which has been submitted by the Senator from North Dakota is now pending before the Banking and Currency Committee, because no such bill has been introduced in those terms, but the subcommittee is dealing with the whole question. I am a member of that subcommittee, and, after conference, I think that to-morrow the subcommittee will report favorably upon legislation dealing with this problem, and adequately dealing with it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Will the subcommittee report the proposition we are now considering, namely, the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no authority to bind the members of the committee by anything I might say, but, if the proposition is submitted to that subcommittee, I can assure the Senator it will be given careful consideration.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not think that proposition is at all involved in the measures submitted to the consideration of the committee.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, as chairman of the subcommittee dealing with the farm-loan banks, I should like to say that the question of moratoriums will be considered in connection with the bill that is now pending before that committee. If the Senator from Iowa will read the House bill, he will find that that bill provides for a kind of moratorium. I hope that we may be able to work out something better; something that will help the farm-loan banks and will also give relief to the farmers.

Mr. BROOKHART. There are different kinds of moratoriums. The pending amendment provides for a real one and for a method of carrying it out.

Mr. CAREY. I want to say to the Senator that I hope we can provide relief for the farmers and at the same time not break down the farm-loan banks.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Wyoming has yielded the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. As I understand, the bill before the subcommittee is a bill providing a hundred million dollars; it relates only to the Federal land banks, and can not embrace any other farmers than those who have come under the Federal land banks. That only involves about one-eighth or one-ninth of all the farmers of the country. What does the subcommittee propose to do with the farmers not included in the bill who are in the same distress?

Mr. CAREY. I do not believe that we have any jurisdiction or any right to grant moratoriums in the case of loans made by private banks. I am only referring to the farm-loan banks.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me ask the Senator another question. It has been stated that the subcommittee was going to deal with the whole question of the extension of credit to farmers. I should like to inquire whether or not the subcommittee is going to consider only those farmers who are included within the Federal land-bank system, or is the committee going to give consideration to all the farmers of the country who are situated likewise?

Mr. CAREY. My thought was that, considering the emergency, we should first act upon the measure providing for additional capital for the farm-loan banks, taking care of a moratorium for the borrowers from such banks. Later on I hope the committee can make a thorough investigation of farm credits and perhaps report legislation that will bring about the necessary relief.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will permit me further, the present emergency affects all the farmers of the country equally with those farmers within the Federal land banks. Why grant a special privilege to a very small portion of the farmers because of an emergency that affects identically the same all the farmers of the country?

Mr. CAREY. I feel that we should first dispose of this measure, which will not take so much time or so much study, and then take time to make a thorough study of the entire subject. I do not think we can work that all out within the few days before Congress shall again convene. I hope, however, to have this measure in a condition to be reported to the Senate immediately on the reconvening of Congress.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, I merely want to say that, if the farm loan bank bill which has been passed by the House could be enacted into law and farm-loan bonds could be reestablished in public confidence and sold, about a billion dollars of new money would be provided for farmers who are not now in debt to the farm banks but who could get the money which, at least in many sections of the country, they can not get elsewhere.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I want to make a statement. The bill that has been passed by the House of Representatives has incorporated in it the principle of bills which have been introduced in preceding Congresses, including a bill introduced in the first session of the last Congress. It embodies a principle that several of us have been endeavoring to have incorporated into the law. It was not as liberal as we had hoped it might be, but since the bill has passed the House and come over to the Senate, I have reason to believe that certain amendments will be placed on it that will make it meet as nearly as possible the necessities of the case. I do not think that that proposed legislation should be restricted, as it would be of necessity, in view of the conditions if we were called upon to vote on it at this time.

I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor but who feels the absolute necessity of enacting some legislation looking to the relief of the inexpressibly frightful condition of the farmers of this country. When that bill will come before this body I sincerely hope that every Senator will give it the support which it deserves. At that time we shall not be limited to the few minutes which are now available to us to discuss such an important question.

I do not want to be put in the attitude of voting against a principle for which I have worked so hard and which I believe to be so necessary; and I desire it to be thoroughly understood that in voting against this amendment, as I shall vote against it, in no manner is my vote an indication that I am indifferent to the frightful condition of the farmers of this country. I shall give all the time and attention that is necessary to the consideration of the bill to which the Senator from North Carolina has referred.

I say this much in explanation of the vote I shall cast. I do not think that the moratorium or any other measure that may come before this Congress is comparable in importance to legislation designed to ameliorate the distressed condition of the farmers and to provide also against an absolute breakdown of the financial system that has obtained until the present time. Despite the untold millions that we have at our command, we have not yet formulated any law by which people can be employed and the wealth of the country equitably distributed. With millions upon millions of people hungry and starving and a surplus of food, naked and a surplus of clothing, we sit down here and say that we must not violate the law or precedents, that we must hold on to that which has submerged our civilization and ruined us economically. We are to-day penalizing thrift. We are saying to our people the only way you can get along is to cease production; we have too much and must restrict production, while millions are hungry, naked, and starving.

If we can do no better, let us palliate the condition for the time being and then go to the roots of this matter and see if our financial and monetary system is not to blame for these periodic crises that come.

We have solved the problem of transportation. We have solved the problem of communication. We are rapidly driving disease from the country, and yet we have not statesmanship enough or men of capacity enough to solve the problem of an equitable distribution of the marvelous abundance of wealth with which Providence has blessed us.

That is the problem that confronts Congress and confronts the American people—not to relieve a handful of farmers here and there, but to bring back the hope of reward for industry, giving to those who produce the wealth of this country the right and opportunity to share the wealth that they produce, and not make them peons on the domain of a favored few.

It is a big problem, and one to which we ought to address ourselves. Instead of calling the great magnates of wealth before our committees we ought to call in the yeomanry of this country and the men who work in the factories and hear the men who are suffering under this horrible condition. We are filling our committees with the very men who are responsible for this horrible condition, and asking the perpetrators of it to suggest to us a remedy.

No, Mr. President! The time has come for us to meet this condition. It is brand-new. We are in a new world. We have no precedent. I am having tabulated now the actual money that is needed to carry on our moving-picture industry, our radio industry, and our automobile industry. Those are brand-new to the world; and, according to the advance sheets already rendered, it will take double the currency, the actual cash in this country, to carry on those industries and leave nothing but a mere basis of credit for the great fundamental industries of this country!

It is time for some of us to take a broader and profounder view of this calamity that has overtaken civilization in the midst of the greatest facilities for production in farm, field, and factory that civilization ever knew.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has said with regard to the condition of the farmer, that something must be done to help him; but it seems to me we are making a mighty poor start here to-night.

This amendment to give the farmers a moratorium for their debts—part of them, at least—undoubtedly will be voted down. We undoubtedly will vote by a big majority to give the European nations a moratorium of $250,000,000 that some of them at least do not need, and to help the international bankers of Wall Street. That is what this joint resolution is being put across for, and it will be of no benefit to the farmers of this country, either. It will put upon the farmers as well as the other taxpayers of this country the burden of paying the $250,000,000 that are set aside by this moratorium that will be passed here to-night.

Mr. President, I think it is high time that the farmers of this country who produce the wealth of the Nation, who produce the food products to feed the Nation, should be given some attention.

The farmers of the South need a moratorium as much as the farmers of the Middle West and West and Northwest. Oh, yes; they are broke down there, just as they are in every other part of the United States. They are broke right here in the East, too. The farmers are broke and going out of business by the wholesale because they can not sell their products for the cost of production. They can not get money with which to pay their debts.

Here the United States Congress, who are responsible, if you please, for the farmer's condition to-day—yes, they are—are voting for a moratorium on war debts to the amount of $250,000,000 and denying the farmers, under this joint resolution, the right to the same privilege of a moratorium for a year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE]. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the preceding roll call, I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], who is unavoidably absent. Because I do not know how he would vote upon this amendment, I will withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and withhold my vote.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). Again I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. If my colleague were present, on this question he would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS (when Mr. KEYES's name was called). The junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. Were he present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of my general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. If present, he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the preceding roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 15, nays 60, as follows:

So Mr. NYE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, after line 15, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

It is hereby declared to be the sense of the Congress of the United States, in the light of documentary evidence accumulating since 1919, that the Government of the United States ought to take such steps as will make it clear that it no longer will permit itself to be regarded even by implication under the terms of the treaty of Berlin of June, 1921, as acquiescing in the formal charge made in article 231 of the treaty of Versailles to the effect that Germany alone was responsible for the war terminated by those treaties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded. Is the demand sufficiently seconded? [After a pause.] Apparently, it is not sufficiently seconded.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Chair that quite a number of hands went up after the Chair's vision, as it seemed to me, had passed by and gone to the other side. I hope the Chair will put the request again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well; the Chair will state the question again.

On this question the yeas and nays are demanded. Is the demand sufficiently seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the preceding vote of my pair with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I repeat the announcement previously made with regard to my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). Repeating my announcement in regard to my colleague's illness and pair, I desire to state that if he were present, on this question he would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS (when Mr. KEYES's name was called). Repeating the announcement of the unavoidable absence from the Chamber of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], I desire to state that if he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], and withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. FESS (when Mr. WATERMAN'S name was called). I again announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN].

The roll call was concluded.

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 64, as follows:

YEAS—10

Blaine	Frazier	Norris	Wheeler

So Mr. SHIPSTEAD'S amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is still on its second reading and open to amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think there is an amendment printed and lying on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been formally offered. Does the Senator from Oklahoma offer the amendment?

Mr. GORE. Yes; I offer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 1, after the word "payment," insert the words "80 per cent"; and on the same page, at the end of line 7, strike out the period and add a colon and the words "Provided, That the partial payment herein required shall be held as a special fund to be used for the relief of the unemployed."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the attitude of the Senate is perfectly obvious and I shall not detain Senators by speaking on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is on its second reading and still open to amendment. If there is no further amendment to be proposed, the question is, Shall the joint resolution be read a third time?

The joint resolution was read a third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution having been read three times, the question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). Again announcing my general pair with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], who is unavoidably absent, I am advised that if he were present he would vote "yea," and being permitted to vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY (when Mr. COUZENS'S name was called). The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] is necessarily absent. He is unable to find a pair, but if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS (when Mr. WATERMAN'S name was called). The senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. Were he present, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. My colleague the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], as has been stated, is necessarily absent because of illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 69, nays 12, as follows:

PUBLIC CONSTRUCTION DURING THE EMERGENCY

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor; and I ask also that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be received, referred, and printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2419) to accelerate public construction during the present emergency, to provide employment, to create the Administration of Public Works, to provide for the more effective coordination and correlation of the public-works activities of the Government, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2419

A bill to accelerate public construction during the present emergency, to provide employment, to create the Administration of Public Works, to provide for the more effective coordination and correlation of the public-works activities of the Government, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That it is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress to provide for the more effective conduct and administration of Federal public-works activities; that, during the period of emergency hereby recognized to exist, public-works expenditures should be largely expanded in order to stimulate production and business activity and to alleviate unemployment; and that in pursuance of this policy it is the desire of Congress that the expenditure of the emergency funds made available by this act shall be governed, in the discretion of the Administrator of Public Works, provided for in section 2, by the following considerations:

(1) Facility with which projects may be gotten under way at the earliest possible date.

(2) Amount of labor that will be employed, directly or indirectly.

(3) Number and diversity of the industries which will be affected, directly or indirectly, by said projects.

(4) Value of the projects to the economic and social welfare of the country.

(5) Economical administration of the work.

The Administrator of Public Works shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He shall receive a salary at the rate of $15,000 per annum, and his term and tenure of office shall be like that of the heads of the executive departments.

(b) The administrator—

(1) Shall maintain the principal office of the Administration of Public Works in the District of Columbia, and such other offices in the United States as in his judgment are necessary.

(2) Shall cause a seal of office to be made for the Administration of Public Works, of such device as the President shall approve, and judicial notice shall be taken thereof.

(3) Shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

(4) Shall make annually, at the close of each fiscal year, a report in writing to Congress giving an account of all moneys received and disbursed by him and the Administration of Public Works, describing the work done by the Administration of Public Works, and making such recommendations as he shall deem necessary. (6) May make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government and elsewhere, for law books, periodicals and books of reference, and for printing and binding) as are necessary to execute the functions vested in the administrator or in the Administration of Public Works. Such expenditures shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the administrator.

(b) The following-named officers, commissions, boards, and branches of the public service now under the jurisdiction of the Department of War, and all that pertains to the same, except such instrumentalities as are exclusively or chiefly employed in the construction of fortifications and other works primarily and directly connected with the national defense, are hereby transferred from the Department of War to the Administration of Public Works: The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, the Board of Engineers of New York City, the Office of the Supervisor of the Harbor of New York, the United States Engineer Offices, the Mississippi River Commission, the California Débris Commission, the Board of Road Commissioners for Alaska, the Alaska Telegraph and Cable System, Northern and Northwestern Lake Survey, municipal functions pertaining to the District of Columbia, and all other agencies and instrumentalities under the jurisdiction of the Department of War which are principally employed in the supervision or prosecution of engineering works or other public works of a nonmilitary character. For the purpose of giving to the officers of the United States Army and/or Navy the broadest possible experience in engineering work, such officers may, with the consent and approval of the Administrator of Public Works, be detailed by the Secretary of War and/or the Secretary of the Navy, to temporary duty in the Administration of Public Works, and they shall be assigned by the administrator to such duties as he shall, after consultation with the Secretary of War and/or the Secretary of the Navy, deem best adapted to the purposes of such detail; and all such officers shall retain their military or naval rank and succession, and receive the compensation, commutation, and emoluments provided by law in the case of officers of the same rank not detached from the regular service.

(c) The Reclamation Service, and all that pertains to the same, is hereby transferred from the Interior Department to the Administration of Public Works.

Until other quarters are provided, the Administration of Public Works may occupy any buildings or premises now occupied by any bureau, office, or branch of the public service which is by this act transferred to or included in the Administration of Public Works.

SEC. 5. The Administrator of Public Works is hereby given power and authority to make, subject to the approval of the President, such changes in the organization of the bureaus, offices, or other branches of the public service by this act transferred to or included in the Administration of Public Works as may be essential to economical and effective administration, and he is hereby authorized and empowered to reorganize or consolidate, with the approval of the President, any of the bureaus, offices, or other branches of the public service under his jurisdiction, and to set up such divisions, offices, and districts as may be required to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. It is hereby declared to be the intent of Congress that the Administration of Public Works shall aid, so far as practicable, in coordinating the work of other Federal construction agencies. To that end any specified engineering, architectural, or construction project authorized to be prosecuted by and under the direction of any governmental agency other than those included in the Administration of Public Works may, by Executive order, be transferred to the Administration of Public Works, and shall thereupon be prosecuted by it, and reimbursement shall be made therefor by transfer of appropriated moneys in the manner provided by law, except that the Administration of Public Works shall design and construct such public works in conformity with the requirements of the agencies which the Administration of Public Works may be serving.

SEC. 8. In carrying out the emergency construction program the administrator—

1. May appoint advisory boards and committees to advise and confer with him. No salary shall be paid to board or committee members, but when attending meetings or engaged in other activities at the request of the administrator they shall be allowed necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law for civilian employees in the executive branch of the Government.

2. May hold hearings and require, by subpœna, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents and may administer oaths. In case of disobedience to any subpœna the administrator may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents.

(3) Shall submit monthly to the President and to the Senate and House of Representatives (or the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives if those bodies are not in session) a full and detailed report of the emergency activities and expenditures of the Administration of Public Works, together with a statement showing the condition of the funds administered by him. Such reports shall, when submitted, be printed as public documents.

SEC. 9. The administrator is authorized to deduct from any appropriation made pursuant to the authorization contained in this act so much thereof as he deems necessary for the expenses of the Administration of Public Works in carrying out the emergency provisions of this act. The remainder of any such appropriation shall be available for expenditure for the purposes hereinafter set forth, upon allocation by the administrator in accordance with and in furtherance of the policy set forth in section 1 of this act, so far as the administrator deems feasible.

SEC. 10. In addition to the regular appropriations for the public works hereinafter specified the administrator may expend for such public works a total of not to exceed $650,000,000 of the amount authorized in section 7, as follows:

(1) For the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore and hereafter authorized as may be most desirable in the interest of commerce and navigation, and for the prosecution of flood-control projects heretofore or hereafter authorized, not to exceed $200,000,000;

(2) For carrying into effect the provisions of the public buildings act approved May 25, 1926, as now or hereafter amended and supplemented, in respect of public buildings within and without the District of Columbia, not to exceed $275,000,000;

(3) For the construction and reconstruction of forest roads and trails, not to exceed $50,000,000.

(4) For the prosecution of irrigation, drainage, and reclamation projects heretofore or hereafter approved in accordance with law, not to exceed $25,000,000.

(5) For repair and remodeling of existing buildings and structures, and for miscellaneous Federal public works, in the discretion of the President, not to exceed $100,000,000.

SEC. 11. In addition to the regular appropriations for Federal-aid highways, the administrator may allocate an additional $1,000,000,000 of the amount authorized in section 7 for the construction and reconstruction of highways in the manner hereinafter provided, which shall be available for expenditure upon highway projects approved by the administrator, as follows:

(a) Not to exceed $500,000,000 of such amount shall from time to time be apportioned by the administrator among the several States in the manner provided by section 21 of the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented, and shall be available for expenditure in the same manner, so far as practicable, as other funds appropriated for carrying out the provisions of the Federal highway act, with the following exceptions:

(1) The limitation of payments permitted by said act shall be increased to $50,000 per mile, exclusive of the cost of bridges of more than 20 feet clear span.

(2) Any amounts apportioned to any State not claimed by such State shall be available for payment to States who are able to proceed with construction over and above their apportionment.

(3) Such funds may be used as a temporary advance to meet the requirements of such act as to State funds, to be reimbursed to the Federal Government over a period of five years, commencing with the fiscal year beginning next after the termination of the emergency, by making deductions from regular apportionments made from future authorizations for carrying out the provisions of such act.

(b) Not to exceed $150,000,000 of such amount shall be available for meeting 50 per cent of the cost to the several States and their civil subdivisions of highway-bridge construction, without regard to the provisions of the Federal highway act limiting the expenditures of Federal funds to bridges outside certain municipalities.

(c) Not to exceed $250,000,000 of such amount shall be available for meeting 50 per cent of the cost to the several States and their civil subdivisions of elimination of railroad grade crossings.

(d) Not to exceed $100,000,000 of such amount shall be available for meeting 50 per cent of the cost to the several States and their civil subdivisions of elimination of highway grade crossings and construction of by-pass roads.

SEC. 12. (a) The administrator may allocate not to exceed $3,750,000,000 of the amount authorized in section 7 for the purpose of making loans to States and their civil subdivisions for (1) construction of Federal-aid highways; (2) construction of other State, county, and municipal highways, streets and pavements; (3) construction of bridges; (4) construction of water supply and sewerage works; (5) construction of flying fields, exclusive of purchase of lands; (6) establishing of parks and playgrounds, exclusive of purchase of lands; (7) construction of public buildings; (8) elimination of grade crossings; (9) reforestation and fire prevention, exclusive of purchase of lands; and (10) other construction of a public or semipublic character.

(b) Loans made under the provisions of this section shall be for periods of not more than 10 years, at a rate of interest three-fourths of 1 per cent above the average rate at the time of making the loan for the bonds issued theretofore under the provisions of this act, but in no event to exceed 5 per cent. No loans shall be made under the provisions of this section except upon the approval of the finance board created by section 14.

SEC. 13. The administrator may allocate not to exceed $100,000,000 of the amount authorized in section 7 for the purpose of making loans to limited dividend corporations created solely for the erection of housing, on projects for housing families of low-income levels, such projects to have the approval of the administrator with respect to (1) the financial structure and the limitation of the dividends of the corporation, and/or (2) the limitation of the rentals to be charged, and/or (3) the location and plan of the project with respect to city plans, slum clearance, and the rehabilitation of blighted areas in cities, and/or (4) the replacement of housing now unfit for healthful habitation, and/or (5) the guaranties under State or municipal laws and administration of adequate control, and/or (6) the senior or other financing of the project, and (7) such other considerations and safeguards as the administrator shall deem necessary or expedient. Such loans shall be made upon the same terms and conditions as loans made under section 12, except that such loans may be for periods of not more than 30 years, and may be amortized serially within such limitation of time.

SEC. 14. There is hereby created an Emergency Finance Board, to be composed of three members, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. One of the members of the board shall be experienced in State and municipal finance, one shall be experienced in housing construction, and one shall be experienced in banking and finance generally. All applications for loans under sections 12 and 13 shall, subsequent to their approval by the administrator, be referred to the board for its approval. In acting upon such applications for loans the board shall take into consideration (1) the financial condition of the borrower and (2) the ability of the borrower to obtain funds at reasonable rates from other sources. No salary shall be paid to board members, but they shall be paid from funds available for the administration of this act a per diem compensation not to exceed $_____ for time devoted to the business of the board, and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law for civilian employees in the executive branch of the Government. The members of the board shall serve during the continuation of the emergency.

SEC. 15. Appropriations authorized by section 7 shall remain available until expended or until the index of industrial production, as now computed, of the Federal Reserve Board reaches index No. 100. Thereafter the administrator shall make no new commitments, and shall have the emergency powers conferred upon him by this act only so far as may be necessary to complete contracts already under way and liquidate the emergency affairs of the Administration of Public Works.

PROSPERITY BOND ISSUE

SEC. 16. (a) To provide funds for the emergency construction program authorized by this act, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to borrow, from time to time as may be necessary for the purposes of this act, on the credit of the United States, not to exceed $5,500,000,000 and to issue bonds therefor, to be known as "prosperity bonds," in such form as he may prescribe, and at such rate of interest, not to exceed 4¼ per cent per annum, as may be fixed by him.

(b) Such bonds shall be in denominations of $50 and upwards and shall mature 10 years from the date of their issue. The principal and interest thereof shall be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value, and such bonds shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by authority of the United States or its possessions, or by any State or local taxing authority, except (a) estate or inheritance taxes, and (b) graduated additional income taxes, commonly known as surtaxes, now or hereafter imposed by the United States upon the income of individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations.

(c) Such bonds shall be first offered at not less than par, as a popular loan, under such regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury as will give all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to participate therein, and any portion of the bonds so offered and not subscribed for may be otherwise disposed of at not less than par by the Secretary of the Treasury; but no commissions shall be allowed or paid on any bonds issued under authority of this act.

ADDITIONAL TAX LEVY

SEC. 17. (a) In addition to the surtax imposed by section 12 of the revenue act of 1928, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year, beginning with the taxable year 1932, upon the net income of every individual having a net income in excess of $5,000, an additional surtax of 2 per cent of his net income less the credit provided in subdivision (b).

(b) For the purpose of such additional tax there shall be allowed the following credits against the net income of individuals having a net income not in excess of $10,000:

(1) In the case of a single person, a personal exemption of $1,000; or in the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife, a personal exemption of $2,500. A husband and wife living together shall receive but one personal exemption. The amount of such personal exemption shall be $2,500. If such husband and wife make separate returns, the personal exemption may be taken by either or divided between them.

(2) In the case of a change of status the personal exemption shall be determined in the manner provided in section 25 (e) of the revenue act of 1928 in the case of the personal exemption there provided for.

(c) The tax imposed by this section shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon the same basis and in the same manner as the similar taxes imposed by section 12 of the revenue act of 1928, and shall for all purposes be regarded as a tax imposed by Title I of the revenue act of 1928.

(d) All moneys received from taxes imposed by this section shall be covered into a special fund in the Treasury and shall be available only for the payment, redemption, or purchase, at not to exceed par and accrued interest, of any bonds issued pursuant to the provisions of this act; and all moneys in the fund are hereby appropriated for that purpose.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 18. This act shall take effect immediately, except that the provisions of this act in relation to the transfer of any agency from the jurisdiction and control of one officer to the jurisdiction and control of another, or in relation to the transfer of functions from one officer or agency to another, shall take effect on the thirtieth day after the enactment of this act.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COMMITTEE

Mr. CAPPER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 121), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia, or any subcommittee thereof, hereby is authorized during the Seventy-second Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

INVESTIGATION BY TARIFF COMMISSION—CRAB MEAT, ETC.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 122), which was ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission is hereby directed to investigate for the purposes of section 336 of the tariff act of 1930 the differences in the cost of production between the domestic article and the foreign article, and to report at the earliest date practicable upon crab meat, fresh or frozen (whether or not packed in ice), or prepared or preserved in any manner, including crab paste and crab sauce.

HOLIDAY RECESS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, House Concurrent Resolution No. 5, relating to adjournment for the holidays, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That committee has given the resolution consideration and was practically evenly divided, but has ordered a favorable report of the resolution without amendment. I understand that it is a privileged matter, and I present it for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it correct that under Rule XXII this concurrent resolution, when it has been offered, is not debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution is privileged, not debatable, may be amended, and a motion to recommit is in order, which would be debatable.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, before the concurrent resolution is offered, if the Senator will permit me, may I state that, as far as I am personally concerned, I shall be entirely willing to come here every day, Saturdays, Sundays, and Christmas excepted, and go on with the business of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. A parliamentary inquiry.

The President pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Did not the Chair state that this is not a debatable question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has not yet been read. It is being withheld at the request of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the submission of the resolution. Therefore the resolution will be submitted, and debate will be cut off.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask that before the resolution is formally offered I may be permitted to proceed for one minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator who submitted the concurrent resolution to withhold submission of the report from the committee in order to permit a statement to be made by the Senator from Connecticut. If the Chair is wrong in his understanding, the Senator from Washington will correct him.

Mr. JONES. I did not intend to withhold the report. I intended to offer it as I was directed to do by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now offered; it is the regular order, and the concurrent resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 5) as follows:

Resolved, by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Tuesday, December 22, 1931, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian Monday, January 4, 1932.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Washington to have moved the adoption of the concurrent resolution. Is that correct?

Mr. JONES. I presented it under direction of the committee for the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution seems to be here, then, without any motion, but merely as a report from the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move that the resolution be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, and the motion is not debatable. The resolution may be amended.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. The amendment is on the table, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Idaho proposes to strike out "January 4, 1932," and insert "December 28, 1931."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, Rule XXII provides for certain motions to be received with respect to the pending motion. The first of those is to adjourn and the last is to amend. The second is to adjourn to a day certain or that when the Senate adjourns it shall be to a day certain. Are we to understand the Presiding Officer to rule that a motion to adjourn is subject to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The great preponderance of precedents with reference to resolutions of this character is that the motion is privileged, that it is not debatable, that it may be amended, and that the amendment is not debatable, but that a motion to recommit may be made and is debatable.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. At what time is a motion to recommit in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At any time.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to make that motion, if the Senator from Idaho will yield to me to do so.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I move to recommit the concurrent resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, and that motion is debatable.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, my reason for offering the motion is, and my understanding is, that if we make any change in the date or if any amendment at all is made in the concurrent resolution, action on the part of the Senate will be entirely futile, because the House will not agree to it. The result will be that there will be no action whatever taken in the House and there will be no adjournment, and therefore the concurrent resolution will die, so we might as well recommit it as to have that condition exist.

I have been reliably informed this evening that if we make any change whatever in the resolution, no further action will be taken by the House. As a matter of fact, there is not a quorum of the House present at this time. Therefore it seems to me futile to take any action on the resolution if we are going to change the date. If the Senate should provide for a shorter adjournment than to January 4, we might as well recommit the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KING. Why does the Senator assume there will be a change if we take a vote?

Mr. BARKLEY. I assume it from the discussion I have heard among Senators.

Mr. KING. If the Senate shall refuse to adjourn, the House will simply meet every third day and adjourn, so there will be no action taken at either end of the Capitol.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is what I understand will be done.

Mr. KING. Why should we not adjourn as the House has done?

Mr. BARKLEY. We can not adjourn longer than three days without the consent of the House. There is not a quorum of the House present, and I dare say they would not consent that we should take an adjournment of two weeks if we did not consent to their doing the same thing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, may I endeavor to throw a little light on the parliamentary situation? Rule XXII provides as follows:

When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn.
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain.
To take a recess.
To proceed to the consideration of executive business.
To lay on the table.
To postpone indefinitely.
To postpone to a day certain.
To commit.
To amend.

Then it continues:

Which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

I think it elementary in parliamentary law that when a motion itself is not open to debate a subsidiary motion is equally not open to debate. If we can not debate the question of adjourning or adjourning to a day certain, a subsidiary motion to commit would be equally not debatable.

But more than that, if the motion to commit a resolution of this kind is debatable, then as a matter of course any other motion to which the motion to commit is addressed is equally debatable. In other words, we move to commit a motion to adjourn. Some one rises and moves that the Senate adjourn. Then some one can move that that motion be committed to the Committee on Appropriations. Then, according to the construction now given to the rule by the present occupant of the chair, that motion would be debatable. Again, here is a motion to take a recess, which, under the rule, is not debatable, but some one may move to commit that motion to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and then we could debate the motion to commit.

That utterly destroys all the force and effect of the rule, it seems to me. Accordingly I would respectfully submit to the Chair again whether it is sound, and if it is sound, what reasons are there for reaching the conclusion that a motion to commit a motion, which is not debatable, is debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has been speaking wholly with reference to an adjournment of the Senate itself. This comes in the form of a concurrent resolution which has already been acted upon by the House and brought to the floor of the Senate and which may be debated.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] withdraw his motion to recommit and let us take a vote on the amendment? If the amendment is agreed to, the Senator may still make his motion. If the amendment is defeated, then we will be in harmony with the House and perhaps free to act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the circumstances I will withdraw temporarily my motion to recommit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question, then, is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. REED. I understand; but I myself can move to recommit, and I now make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, regardless of the action of the House I think we all ought to have a very sober realization of the fact that the country is faced with problems which are much more important than the construction of Rule XXII and very much more important than the holiday which we shall give ourselves at this time. A great many people in the United States are having an enforced holiday, and I doubt whether the people who sent us here will appreciate our abdication of our functions for two weeks in such times as these.

It may be asked, What can we do if we stay here if we do not adjourn for so long a time? One thing we can do is to take action in committee and in the Senate on the pending bill introduced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] to create the reconstruction finance corporation. The railroads of the United States have never in the lifetime of most of us been faced with such a situation as they are in to-day. Many of the most important systems are not nearly meeting their fixed charges, and while we perhaps lack in sympathy for the railways—some of us do, I know—none of us lack in sympathy for the savings-bank depositors, for the holders of insurance policies, whose solvency depends on the maintenance of a sound market for the bonds of the railway companies.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. No; I do not yield at this moment.

However we may think about the railway problem, there are no two minds about the savings-bank problem or the insurance-company problem or the problem of the little depositors and little policyholders. If we pass the bill providing for the reconstruction finance corporation, much can be done to prevent any more railway receiverships—very much can be done—and we will be thus one week further ahead if we meet here next Monday and go to work on it than if we take a longer holiday and stay away until the 4th of January.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator ought to include in that situation the land-bank system.

Mr. REED. I was going on to mention that. Some of us know to our deep regret the predicament in which the building and loan associations of the country stand or, as they are called in some States, the savings and loan associations. They too base their solvency and their continuance in business upon what were sound mortgages when they were taken, mortgages upon moderate-priced homes, most of them. Such is the condition of their business to-day that a very large part of those mortgages are in default, not because the loans were bad when they were made, not because of bad banking or reckless practices, but simply because of temporary collapses in quoted values. We all know that those loans are sound ultimately. We all know that the tangible values in America are unaffected by this momentary panic. We all know there is nothing the matter with us but the functional troubles due to fear and the collapse of credit that follows fear.

America is sound. Its population is healthy, industrious, sane. We are not troubled with pestilence. Our people are educated, industrious, willing to work. The physical condition of American properties was never before so high as it is to-day. Our highways and our railways physically are in superb shape. Our factories were never so efficient. America never was so sound as it is to-day, but it functions badly because of fear. If we go to work diligently to do something to make these home-mortgage loans available for borrowings, as is proposed in the home loan bank bill; if we do something to bring emergency aid to the railroads between now and April 1, when the Interstate Commerce decision begins to take effect, we will have done something of very real value for all the people of America, the people who are looking to us for action and not for vacation.

I know full well that the adjournment to the 4th of January has been arrived at by discussion between our leaders and the leaders in the House. I try to be a loyal soldier and back up our leaders when they have committed us to any decision.

But, Mr. President, I do not understand that the question of the prestige of our leaders is involved in this matter, and I hope the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] will back me in that statement. I do not understand that to disagree with them in this moment of crisis is any reflection upon the Senator from Indiana or upon the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] or upon others to whom we look for leadership. We are confronted by something which is very real, Senators, something too real to stand on formalities; and I, for my part, shall feel constrained to vote in favor of the amendment and in favor of our reconvening next Monday.

Now, Mr. President, I withdraw my motion to recommit.

Mr. NORRIS. I renew the motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am going to vote the same way as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] says he is going to vote. I hope that announcement does not frighten him; I hope that none of the fear that he has been speaking about will be in his heart and cause him to vote differently, because I am going to vote as he does. I am not only going to vote that way, but I want to join with the Senator from Pennsylvania in rendering my apology to our leader for not following him in this particular instance. Now, Mr. President, I withdraw my motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLASS and Mr. BROOKHART addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Virginia, and the Chair will assume that the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is still pending.

Mr. GLASS. Otherwise, I shall renew it. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I do not know exactly how much better informed about these matters the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is than those of us who have been working on these problems in committee meetings from morning till night, and at night as well, and some of us for three weeks before the Congress convened. I do know that there has been no testimony before the Banking and Currency Committee that would indicate that we should be precipitate about this particular bill, No. 1. On the contrary, the testimony before the Banking and Currency Committee indicated that there was no imminent danger of railroad receivership.

With respect to insurance companies, actually some of the officials of the large insurance companies in this country resented the idea of being included in the bill. They indicated that they thought that there was an implication in such inclusion that the insurance companies were in need of financial assistance, whereas they positively were not.

As for the question of fear, it occurs to me that the constant reiteration here on the floor of the Senate of the desperation of our situation is very much more calculated to create fear than anything we have heard in the formal hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee on this bill. As a matter of fact, the maturities of the railroads between now and the 1st day of May would seem to some of us to indicate that the process instituted before the Interstate Commerce Commission would be ample to take care of any railroad situation that might arise between now and that date.

Some of us are a little impatient over this concerted idea that has been presented that we must be precipitated into some action here regardless of orderly consideration of the problems which confront us. It occurs to me that if the Senate were to violate faith with the other House on the presumption that the country is in a critical state, we would but accentuate that unauthorized and unwarranted supposition. Of course, there is distress, but we are not in any such critical condition as has been repeatedly represented here. If the Senator from Pennsylvania has any source of information which would indicate that not to be so, it seems to me he might have come before the Banking and Currency Committee and given us the benefit of that peculiar knowledge that has not been presented to us and which none of us possess.

I have been in Washington since three weeks before Congress convened; I have been at work on banking problems night and day, sometimes not extinguishing the light in my apartment at my hotel until 10 minutes past 6 o'clock in the morning; and the subcommittees of the Banking and Currency Committee to which these matters have been referred have been hard at work, I think, and they are not in any state of panic; they have nothing to warrant them in standing here on the floor of the Senate and suggesting that the railroads are going into the hands of receivers if we take our ordinary holiday recess. The railroad officials who appeared before our committee made no such statement. On the contrary, the facts and figures presented by them convinced me, as one member of the committee, that there is no imminent necessity for proceeding with undue haste about this bill.

It was understood in the other branch of Congress that the so-called leaders—one of which I am not—of the Senate were in favor of this holiday-recess adjournment; the House acted upon that presumption, which is not unusual, and passed this concurrent resolution; hundreds of Members of the other House have gone to their homes; and now we are asked to forego a Christmas holiday recess upon the assumption that there is a tremendous danger confronting the country. It is not so, Mr. President; or, if it is, the facts have not been brought to the attention of those of us who have given consideration to these matters.

I shall vote to adjourn. I think a vote not to adjourn would imply that these agonizing stories of imminent and critical danger have more substance behind them than they really have.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. BROOKHART addressed the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Iowa desire to discuss this matter?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Who made the last motion to recommit the resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. I think I did.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, was the motion withdrawn?

Mr. NORRIS. I said I would withdraw it, but the Chair, I understand, announced that he would consider it still pending.

Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. BROOKHART addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BINGHAM. I shall only take a minute. I have tried three times now to speak for a minute.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to inquire why I was not recognized?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, there seems to be a general concert to prevent my making a 1-minute speech. The Senator from Montana objected very strenuously to my endeavoring to make a speech before the concurrent resolution was submitted, and since then I have tried to keep quiet and watch the debate proceed.

I merely wanted to say, Mr. President, that, although perfectly willing to stay here and work, in view of the fact that the leaders on both sides of the aisle have agreed with the leaders of both majority and minority parties in the House about this adjournment, I shall vote for the adjournment, because I believe that that is the orderly way in which to proceed when one has leaders.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, as I remember the situation, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] was one of those who saw prosperity just around the corner if we could get rid of the Congress of the United States. They got rid of us; then the moratorium came along, and we all received telegrams from the President of the United States. I desire to read the first part of my answer. It is as follows:

JUNE 25, 1931.

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States,
Washington, D. C.:

Your telegram received and I agree that the proposal of the American Government in respect to postponement for one year of all intergovernmental debts is of immediate national importance, but believe it of too much importance to be decided by the Congress by informal conferences or telegrams to Members. I would therefore suggest an immediate extraordinary session of Congress to consider this proposition.

Yet, as I understand, the Senator from Pennsylvania opposed that proposed extraordinary session; he was in favor of keeping Congress off the job; but now he comes with his crocodile tears for the railroads of the United States, and must have Congress on hand every minute.

Mr. President, I have served on the subcommittee considering Senate bill No. 1, and I agree fully with what the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has just said. I should like to add merely one or two details more. The insurance companies came before us and said they did not need this bill for themselves; that they were solvent and all right and would not take advantage of it. The savings banks came before us and said the same thing. In fact, Mr. Bruyere, head of the largest savings bank in the world, said they were sounder to-day than they had been at any other time. The railroads made no claim of immediate bankruptcy. The only one mentioned in that regard was one that is now in the hands of a receiver, which is its normal condition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not think, does he, because the railroads and the banks and insurance companies made no complaint that we ought not to extend them relief? That is just what we have done in the case of the moratorium. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator's observation fits the facts all right. But I remember 10 years ago, when agriculture became distressed, I did not see any crocodile tears falling from the eyes of the Senator from Pennsylvania about agriculture. A million and a half farmers have lost their homes or their life's savings as a result of the agricultural depression, but that never impressed the Senator from Pennsylvania. No; he is not impressed until somebody from the railroads comes around.

I just went through this 15 per cent advance rate case for the railroads. They showed that as a whole they were still earning, over and above their operating expenses, a net return of 2.24 per cent upon the valuation fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. They are not in a bad condition. They are one of the most prosperous outfits there is in this country.

Mr. President, since 1920 agriculture has lost more than $35,000,000,000 of its capital and has had no return at all upon the other capital investment as a whole; and yet those things have not impressed the Senator from Pennsylvania.

I do not understand exactly what this political bill means. I have tried to find out something about it. I have listened to all of the testimony. I have been at every hearing all the way through. It is a bolshevik bill to start with. It is the first time I have known the Senator from Pennsylvania to stand right plain out, forsquare, for bolshevism. This bill goes into the Treasury of the United States for two thousand million dollars, five hundred million of it to be subscribed in capital and fifteen hundred million of it to be issued in debentures for which the Treasury of the United States is liable upon a guaranty.

I remember when we had some debentures up here for the farmers. They were not so very many compared with the two thousand millions of debentures in this bill, but the Senator from Pennsylvania was opposed to debentures then. He had no sympathy with and shed no tears then for the condition of agriculture at all.

Mr. President, there is something about this situation that is peculiarly offensive to any plan to get out of this depression. What caused it? You knocked the farmers down with your railroad laws. You put $7,000,000,000 of water into that railroad valuation under the transportation act back in 1920.

The operations to sustain it increased the rates on the farmers by 60 per cent over what they had paid before. You took that out of their pockets and transferred it into the pockets of the owners of the railroads, mainly over in New York. Late in 1920 and early in 1921, they put on a deflation policy that caused the greatest panic in farm prices ever known in the history of agriculture. You put on tariff laws that were effective for the protected industries, that protected their prices, and then put rates on agriculture that were not effective, and denied agriculture the debenture that would have made them effective. All of that has gone on until the very present time, and agriculture has gone lower and lower every minute.

In the depression of 1920, other business revived. Other business in 1929 went into the greatest inflation and speculation in all the history of the world. Agriculture stayed down through it all, and yet there was no weeping for agriculture.

What about this bill that the Senator from Pennsylvania is proposing for the relief of the situation? Is there one dollar in it for agriculture? Not one—not one. It mentions these railroads, these insurance companies that do not want it, these savings banks that do not want it, and then it mentions a lot of other big banks that do want it. These railroads and these banks that put on this deflation, that brought this condition upon the country, these men who are responsible for this condition, now want to pass a bill for their own relief.

I want to read to you the rest of my telegram to the President of the United States:

I do not hesitate to express my opinion upon any important public question when all the facts are before me, but this is not possible in your telegram. As I understand the general situation which you mention, the policy of Secretary Mellon, Gov. Eugene Meyer, of the Federal Reserve Board, and Comptroller of the Currency Pole has been to force a branch-banking system upon the United States, controlled mainly by the big eastern banks. For years the Comptroller of the Currency has decried loans by banks in the agricultural States to farmers, because they were not liquid, and this caused the failure of many banks. At the same time he approved the buying of long-time listed bonds, until all the little banks in the agricultural States are now loaded up with these bonds. Yesterday I heard those bonds condemned by the chairman of the Farm Board—and his predecessor, and they were likened to an I. O. U. in a poker game. Also, for several months the comptroller, through his examiners, has been requiring the country banks to put up a depreciation fund or charge off these same bonds, which policy will cause the closing of many other small banks, and thus aid the branch-bank plan. I am also informed that this policy has not been so rigidly enforced against the big eastern banks. However, in spite of all these well-laid plans, the big banks have struck a dangerous snag in the enormous stock speculation; and even after the panic of 1929, and subsequent declines up to December 1, 1930, stock values still remain 208 per cent on an average above the 1914 level of prices, with a resultant proportionate inflation of bonds.

That was the late lamented Mr. Legge—

Mr. President, since that time further estimates have shown that these stocks have declined; but, as you will see from the chart on the wall here which the Federal Reserve Board itself gave me, they are still 50 per cent up in the air above the 1914 level, and that was too high, while all other commodity prices have gone below the 1914 level.

These facts becoming known to the country, stock speculation declined, because values are still on a volcano of inflation, and the public refused to buy. This has endangered the big eastern banks themselves, and they are certainly making frantic efforts to renew the stock speculation. The first effect of your announcement in reference to postponement of the intergovernmental debts was to renew this gigantic stock boom. Such a result is unsound, and means future disaster unheard of.

I shall therefore certainly insist upon some legislation, perhaps similar to the speculative stock sales tax offered by Senator GLASS as an amendment to the tariff act, before I vote for any proposal that will revive the stock-gambling orgy.

SMITH W. BROOKHART.

Mr. President, I can not see anything in this bill—this $2,000,000,000 bolshevistic bonus bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator if he sent that telegram collect? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKHART. I think, Mr. President, that the President of the United States got that telegram.

Mr. KEAN. Who paid for it?

Mr. BROOKHART. It is marked "Official business."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Iowa whether he included that chart in his telegram to the President? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKHART. I sent down to the Federal Reserve Board and got that chart.

Mr. FESS. Did the Senator put it in the telegram?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; I have not sent that to the White House yet. I think they need it over there, though.

I see nothing now in this bolshevik bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania except a scheme to revive that stock-gambling game, if they can do that through something out of the United States Treasury for the railroads and the big banks. They have already tried three different schemes to boom those railroad stocks.

On was a consolidation of the big eastern railroads—something never contemplated by this law. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] hit that between the eyes, and it died.

Then along came this 15 per cent rate advance. The Interstate Commerce Commission allowed only a little of that, and the stock boom did not start on that.

Then along came this moratorium, and that did start a boom for a few days; but as soon as a stock boom starts, those men who are still holding some of those stocks begin selling, and down goes the boom. [Laughter.]

Now the Senator from Pennsylvania gets together the big financial autocrats of this country, and they cook up bill No. 1, and have it dressed and ready for presentation when Congress meets, and it is introduced as the very first bill in the Senate of the United States. It is rushed over to the committee, and an investigation is put on. "We must have this all at once. These savings banks and these insurance companies need it, and the poor railroads."

When we got under way there was no one but the railroads and the New York banks left to support it, and one big Chicago bank; and that is the way it stands at this minute.

Will that bill do any good?

If we pass that bill and take this money from the Treasury, to whom will we give it? To the railroads, who are not entitled to it and who do not need it, who still have that $7,000,000,000 of watered value in their stocks and bonds? Then there is nobody else to benefit except a few big banks; and how will the benefits reach down to the six and one-half million farmers of this country who are in actual distress and have been in distress since 1920? That distress now has reached around into the other industries and the other businesses of the country, until many of the wheels of industry have stopped, and 7,000,000 men are unemployed as a result of this situation.

If we had a bill here to relieve agriculture, if we had a bill here to start public works and employ these 7,000,000 men who are out of work, I should be willing to stay here day and night. I am willing to stay anyhow; but, Mr. President, there is no such situation. This is some Wall Street political scheme, rather than anything to relieve the real economic situation of this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is any motion to recommit now before the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. I withdraw the motion to recommit.

Mr. BORAH. Now I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

Mr. WATSON. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

PHILIPPINE AFFAIRS

Mr. BINGHAM presented resolutions adopted by the Solidaridad Filipina, Manila, P. I., which were referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution supporting the Timberlake bill limiting the free entry into the United States of certain Filipino products; urging limitation of Filipino immigration thereto and the continuation of the United States Government in the Philippines for the present and certain amendments in the Jones law

Whereas it is a fact that a portion of the people of the United States represented by their respective Senators and Representatives in Congress and by certain Federal labor organizations earnestly desires the withdrawal of the United States Government from these islands for the purpose of eliminating the competition of certain Filipino products to their home products, having requested the United States Congress to give the Philippines an immediate and absolute independence, which will be disastrous to the Filipinos at the present time; and

Whereas it is also a fact, based on statistics, that our present government and economic stability depend and will depend for some time yet on the continuation of the altruistic and beneficial control and progressive influence of the United States Government; and

Whereas, due to our continuous contact with the Spaniards for more than three centuries, our character, activities, customs, and usages, laws, and psychology have greatly become Latin-Spanish; and the Latin people, according to that great English statesman, Lord Gladstone, are not adapted to popular and modern representative democratic governments; and

Whereas the lapse of some time will be needed by us in order to eradicate these acquired Latin traits and for our gradual readjustment and adaptation to these modern and popular representative democracies; and

Whereas our so-called nationalistic leaders and their few followers who have monopolized for more than two decades the management of our public affairs have clearly shown that their Latin-acquired traits are not yet fully eradicated, as evidenced by their questionable running of our government, their irresponsibility, and corruption;

Whereas our inexperience in financial matters was shown by these very leaders in their mismanagement of our Philippine National Bank in 1921 before the administration of Governor General Wood, by their nonselection of the best available local talent for the management of said bank, by their favoritism and nepotism selecting only their relatives and friends, irrespective of individual merits and capacity, thus retarding our development in financial affairs; and

Whereas all these facts clearly show the impracticability, for the present, of our immediate separation from the United States inasmuch as some time will be needed to enable us to acquire the proper experience in financial matters, and especially to properly work our economic development; and

Whereas our political concessions secured have only favored our few so-called leaders and politicians for their own personal gain and benefit, while our economic development, which is our real and great problem, has been greatly neglected by them, a condition already noted by Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG when he was in these islands in April of this year, when he frankly stated before his departure from Manila that our real problem was an economic one and not political; and

Whereas Solidaridad Filipina, a civic association incorporated since August, 1921, under the laws of these islands, and organized for the purpose of working for the prosperity and happiness of the people of these islands through the proper expansion and development of our economic and natural resources, setting aside, for the present, our political advancement which is already highly developed, that in many cases it is misused by our so-called leaders and politicians to foster nepotism, favoritism, and political bossism, this civic association finds itself compelled to take this action and pass this resolution for the purpose of analyzing the reasons our so-called leaders and politicians have advanced for requesting our immediate and premature separation from such a generous and altruistic Government as that of the United States of America, strong, wealthy, and powerful, which guarantees our Government and Territorial integrity and is trying to develop our country in all directions so as to enable us to occupy our proper place among the nations of the world; and for the purpose of making certain suggestions which Solidaridad Filipina believes to be the wishes of that portion of responsible, well-meant, and intelligent Filipinos: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by Solidaridad Filipina, To suggest, and it hereby suggests, the following to the Congress of the United States of America—

(a) The passage of the Timberlake bill limiting the free entry into the United States of our sugar to 1,000,000 tons yearly, our coconut oil to 800,000,000 pounds per annum, and our immigration into continental United States at a just and reasonable number per year, to be determined by a mixed committee of Americans and Filipinos appointed by the President of the United States.

(b) That our political concessions and autonomy should remain in a status quo at present, except the necessary increase thereof consistent with our gradual advancement and development.

(c) That the Government of the United States of America should remain in these islands for the present, provided that in case an action is contemplated by Congress regarding our final status the same be planned in accordance with the plan formulated by Senator HIRAM BINGHAM'S resolution introduced in Congress on January 6, 1930, which authorizes the President of the United States to call a conference to be held in the Philippines (at Manila), to include eight representative citizens of the United States and an equal number from the Philippines, which would make recommendations as to the future of the Philippines and its final government.

(d) The urgent and necessary amendments of the Jones law on the following points:

1. To reduce the maximum duration of the regular annual sessions of the Philippine Legislature from 100 to 50 days, and that of the special sessions thereof, whenever called, to continue no longer than 15 days, except Sundays.

2. That the general elections in the Philippines be held once every four years, instead of every three years, as at present, for the purpose of saving money in election expenses.

3. That the Governor General of the Philippines be authorized to dissolve the Philippine Legislature when just and reasonable reasons exist to do so, like the authority of the Governor General of Canada.

4. That the Governor General of the Philippines be authorized to fill all cases of vacancies in any and all elective positions of any kind and nature for the unexpired term of the elective vacated positions, thus effecting a considerable and substantial saving in the expenditure of public funds for special elections.

6. That the auditor of the Philippines, also called the insular auditor, be made a real and full comptroller with full and complete auditing powers on all public or government financial matters and accounts of the three departments of the government; and be it further

Resolved, By Solidaridad Filipina, in its own name and in that of the people of these islands, whose desires it is interpreting and voicing, to reiterate, and it hereby reiterates their gratitude, high and sincere appreciation, and unconditional loyalty to the generous and altruistic Government and people of the United States of America, to make amends for the ungratefulness of our so-called political leaders and politicians; and be it finally

Resolved, By Solidaridad Filipina, to furnish copies of this resolution to all the States of the Union, in addition to those furnished the Federal authorities and Members of the United States Congress.

Unanimously adopted at Manila, Philippine Islands, November 21, 1931.

JOSÉ E. ALEMANY,
President Solidaridad Filipina.

To the UNITED STATES SENATE,
Through the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, Washington, D. C., U. S. A.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1931

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. John Compton Ball, of the Metropolitan Baptist Church, of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, we come to Thee at this time recognizing Thy majesty and greatness and power, regnant over all nature; and we pray that our wills may be dominated by Thee; that every thought and word and act, and the duties of the day and the hour, may be to Thy good pleasure. We are not unmindful of the fact, O God, we are approaching that time of the year which marks the bestowing of the greatest gift upon the world that it has ever known; and we come to praise Thy holy name for this invaluable gift, this unspeakable gift. We thank Thee that our Lord Jesus Christ was born as a babe; that He came not as a full-grown man like Adam, for had that been so we might have thought He did not understand our nature, but coming as a little child and growing to a splendid boyhood and to a matchless manhood He can enter into our lives at every point and every age. We pray that the sweet spirit that dominated Him may dominate our land and every heart, from that of the President of the United States down to the humblest citizen, from the oldest to the youngest; and that the great spirit of charity and love may spread over all our land, and that the song of the angels may be ours—Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace, good will to all men. For His sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INCREASE OF FREIGHT RATES

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short statement I submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission on August 11 last, protesting against the increase in freight rates.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a statement submitted by me to the Interstate Commerce Commission on August 11, 1931.

The statement is as follows:

In registering my protest against the proposed increase of 15 per cent in freight rates I am not unmindful that the railroads or transportation companies have suffered seriously during this economic depression, but we should not forget that there are others who have suffered just as much and many a great deal more, all of whom are entitled to the same consideration at the hands of our Government. I want to state further at the outset that, in the economy of production and distribution, the carrier has no greater natural right to existence or a guaranteed income from its efforts or investments than the producer.

On the other hand, if there is a superior or prior right to any special consideration or inducement that right must of necessity be resolved in favor of the producer, because his activities and contribution to the economy of mankind existed long before the services of a carrier was needed.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose at this time to discuss the relative importance of these two great factors in the economy of man, for they are both extremely vital, and I might say indispensable, under our existing standard of civilization. However, if certain types or classes of producers are to continue to exist, some one must see to it that the market value of their labors are not wholly absorbed by the carrier or distributor. On the contrary, if the Government or any governmental agency should attempt to determine or regulate the value of the efforts or services of either, it should be just as considerate of the one as of the other.

Just at this time both are suffering great financial losses, and if there was ever a time when conditions demanded sympathetic cooperation between the producer and the carrier it is now; and I do not think that there has ever been a more inopportune time for the carrier to ask or demand a higher price for his services than at present. The natural and logical thing under the circumstances would be a reduction in freight rates instead of an increase. The price or market value of everything has decreased except freight rates. The value of man's labor has decreased 100 per cent in some cases, from 10 to 50 per cent in most cases, but the carrier in this case takes the position that it is entitled to a fixed income and, therefore, must have an increase in freight rates in order to make it.

In this connection I want to repeat that naturally it is not entitled to a fixed income any more than the producer, and the commission should not lose sight of this fact in its deliberations and conclusions. In the light of my observations and experience an increase in rates now will certainly result in a decrease in business or volume for the carrier and very likely a decrease in total income to the railroads. If this is true, the producer will certainly be a loser, particularly those engaged in agriculture, a class of producers who have contributed more toward the support, upkeep, maintenance, and prosperity of the transportation companies than any other class. Right now farm products in different parts of the country are going to waste in the fields, and we hear that there are thousands or even millions of people in cities who are suffering for lack of food. Why? It is all because the rate for the services rendered in transportation is more than the market value of the labor entering into the production of the commodity and is greater than what may be termed the corresponding purchasing capacity of the consumer. As a consequence the commodity fails to move and both producer and carrier are losers. An increased rate in freight will mean that additional crops or commodities will remain in the field, resulting in additional losses to the producer and carrier. It will be admitted that there is a pronounced decrease in the cost of production of most crops. If there should be a corresponding decrease in the cost of transportation, many of these commodities or crops could move from field to market and consumption of same greatly increased.

I understand the railroads are saying that they are suffering on account of serious competition from motor-bus lines; that a large per cent of the freight formerly carried by the railroads is now being hauled by truck, and that an increase in freight rates is necessary in order for the railroads to maintain a certain or definite income. I do not doubt but that the motor truck is carrying much that was formerly carried by the railroads, because they are carrying it cheaper, and it is my judgment if you increase the freight rates the motor truck will carry a much larger proportion of the freight than at present. An increase in freight rates will not add one pound to the volume of freight carried by the railroads. It will give the motor trucks an opportunity to increase their rates and at the same time increase the volume of business in competition with the railroads, which will operate to the loss or injury of the producer; for, in the last analysis, the producer always pays the freight regardless of who carries it. An increase of rates at this time will, therefore, be a great loss to the producer, and he is unable to afford it.

PROPOSED AUTOMOBILE TAXES

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the President's message and on law enforcement and taxation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, the Congress is now considering proposed heavy, unjust, and exorbitant taxes on automobiles, autotrucks, parts, tires, and accessories.

The automobile industry is the key industry of the Nation, and realizes that the imposition of these taxes, which would amount to about $80,000,000 for the next fiscal year and as much as $200,000,000 in prosperous years, would not only be a terrific blow to the automotive industry itself but would retard the recovery of many other important industries in the country.

The automobile industry staged legislative battles beginning in 1923, which was led by myself, to kill the odious war-excise taxes similar in nature to these taxes proposed this year by the Treasury Department, and in successive cuts by Congress in 1924, 1926, and 1928 they absolutely killed all the war-excise Federal sales taxes on autos, trucks, parts, tires, and accessories.

But the resentment shown by the spokesmen of the industry and the owners of the cars and the accessory businesses dependent upon the industry was mild from 1923 to 1928 compared to the fierce anger which these leaders show now as the industry is attacked just when it is on its way to recovery. Moreover, the auto industry is generally accepted as the one to lead all the other industries of the country to recovery.

AIDS OTHER LEADING INDUSTRIES

The automotive industry is the biggest industrial enterprise of the Nation, but it aids by purchases of material other important industries, as follows: Steel, 15.5 per cent; aluminum, 17.4 per cent; copper, 14.8 per cent; rubber, 82.6 per cent; lead, 26 per cent; nickel, 30 per cent; gasoline, 85 per cent.

Many other great industries are aided, such as the lumber industry, which, for instance, sells a billion feet of lumber per year to the auto industry.

The railroads are tremendously benefited by an enormous amount of revenue from carrying the raw materials to the factories and then transporting the finished product or the knocked-down product to the consumer and the assembling depots.

Steamship lines profit tremendously from the automobile industry.

The New England States, and particularly Connecticut, profit vastly through manufacturing and selling machinery to the auto industry.

ALL STATES AIDED BY AUTO INDUSTRY

There are automobile and accessory factories in 41 of the 48 States. Each of the 48 States furnishes from 2 to 17 per cent of the raw materials of the automobile industry.

Four million working men and working women make their living through the automobile industry, and, as it is fair to presume that each working person is supporting at least three or four dependents, about 15,000,000 men, women, and children are supported directly or indirectly by the automobile industry.

Contemplate the stupendous sum spent by the automobile industry for advertising, which is another aid to American business.

COURAGE, ENTERPRISE, AND PATRIOTISM

No American industry during the terrible depression has shown the audacious courage, the daring enterprise, and the unparalleled patriotism which the automotive industry has demonstrated time and again since its inception only a few years ago.

Every American should be stirred to pride by the challenge to a sick and depressed world flung at the annual automobile show in New York City a few days ago.

The amazing record was made in the worst period the automobile industry has ever had by producing 217 new models, practically all of them giving increased values at decreased selling prices.

This most sensational gamble of all industrial history was made while practically all the companies were "in the red" and were daily losing money.

The new models meant the junking of many millions of dollars' worth of practically new machinery and the installation of newer machinery, tools, jigs, dies, stamps, drills, and so forth. Some of these individual pieces of machinery were enormous in size, and they cost until they hurt. Millions of dollars' worth of parts and accessories in stores and depots all over the United States went to the junk heap when these new models were issued.

The big investment of the automobile manufacturers already made was jeopardized, and an enormous added investment was hazarded. The Rubicon was crossed, the die was cast, and the Caesar of the industrial world is marching on the citadel of depression.

The largest possible number of employees and distribution of work was made by bringing men in this vast imperial progress.

AUTOS NOT LUXURIES OR SEMILUXURIES

The Treasury Department, in its strange hostility to the automobile industry, has insisted for years that the automobile and autotruck are luxuries or semiluxuries and are to be classed in the same category with cigarettes, soft drinks, candy, jewelry, moving-picture houses and other theaters, and so forth.

Every student of political economy knows that the necessities of life are food, clothing, fuel, shelter, and transportation. It is only the Treasury Department experts who claim that transportation is a luxury. Yet they modify this attitude by saying that the horse and buggy and wagon are not luxuries or semiluxuries, and that the railroad freight car, passenger car, and locomotive are not luxuries. They say that the freight or passenger airplanes are not luxuries or semiluxuries.

They declare that the freight or passenger vessels are not luxuries, but in the rulings they have said that some pleasure yachts are luxuries and especially the larger pleasure yachts, which, of course, everyone knows are luxuries.

The automobile which competes with all of the above and which has largely displaced the horse and buggy and wagon is declared, however, by the Treasury Department to be a luxury or semiluxury.

Recent statistics of the Census Bureau show that a surprisingly large number of automobile trucks are owned and operated by farmers. Four million cars and 26 per cent of all motor trucks are owned by farmers. As I recall the figures, about 80 per cent of the farms in the Middle West, for instance, have autotrucks. All the garden truck farmers living near the cities have autotrucks instead of horses and buggies, and life has been made tremendously easier and the business more profitable by substituting the autotruck for the horse and buggy.

On the farms, the cheap, hardy, passenger automobile often serves as a truck in carrying commodities as well as the family to and from the near-by towns.

The great farm organizations of the United States have taken the attitude that the automobile is not a luxury or semiluxury and is an absolute necessity of life to the farmer.

Accurate statistics show that two-thirds of all car buyers have annual incomes of $3,000 or less and that more cars are sold to persons having incomes of fourteen hundred dollars or less per year than to those having $7,000 or more.

TAXES

The Treasury Department has always maintained, especially under Secretary of the Treasury Mellon and Under Secretary of the Treasury Mills, that the automobile is escaping taxation and should be taxed more. Statistics show that the owners of 26,000,000 motor vehicles paid almost a billion dollars in special motor taxes in 1931. Also, they paid large sums in personal property and other general taxes. They are subjected now to gasoline, registration, wheelage, and other special taxes, including such levies as those on drivers' permits and license taxes.

AUTO AND RAILROAD TAXES

Mr. Mills and also Mr. Mellon have continuously argued before Senate and House committees that the railroads are more heavily taxed than the automobile industry. Their statements are not true, and the automobile industry is far more heavily taxed than the railroad industry; and the auto industry is the most heavily taxed necessity industry in the country.

For instance, the railroads pay only $400,000,000 per year in real estate and property taxes, whereas the automobile industry not only pays real estate, property, and other general taxes, but it pays a billion dollars per year in sales taxes.

It is particularly distressing to me to set the railroad industry off against the automobile industry, as Ogden Mills has often done. Andrew Mellon is guilty of the same offense.

The automobile industry can not be permanently injured by such antagonisms, and Mr. Mills and Mr. Mellon are inviting trouble for the railroad industry when they endeavor to create friction and antagonism between the two industries. The automobile industry simply refuses to get into a row with the railroad industry, and every automotive leader that I have talked to is very anxious to help and assist the railroads in their difficulties rather than to hinder or harass them.

That is certainly my attitude and I want to be of all possible aid to the railroads in their endeavor to get legislative assistance. Recently, I voted for the $2,000,000,000 reconstruction loan bill, which is designed primarily to assist railroads.

THE MOTIVE FOR THE AUTOMOBILE TAX

But, unfortunately, the arguments of Mr. Mills and Mr. Mellon that the automobile industry must be crippled by heavy taxes to assist the railroads must be faced, as they have made a heavy impression upon many Congressmen and Senators with whom I have talked. These legislators have been misled into believing that automobiles must be heavily taxed to assist the railroads.

Congressional hearings and records show very bluntly this form of attack. For instant, Ogden Mills, the Under Secretary of the Treasury, spoke with all the power of the administration behind him in 1928, when the administration party was in control of both the House and Senate, assumed this false and damaging line of reasoning. Mr. Mills said before the House Ways and Means Committee in 1928:

> The automobile is one of the railroad's chief competitors. Is it quite fair to ask the railroads to contribute to the construction and maintenance of the roads on which their rivals operate, while exempting the latter from any contribution?
>
> Once the automobile tax is repealed it can not be reimposed in time of peace.
> We have eliminated most of our excise taxes. There remain for revenue purposes the excise tax on tobacco and automobile sales, the admissions tax, and a few stamp taxes. All of these should be retained in the interest of a well-balanced tax system.

Moreover, Mr. Mills issued a statement December 29, 1931, in an effort to bolster up his crusade, and asked, "Can anyone seriously complain * * * if even automobiles cost a trifle more?" His "trifle" consists of a tax amounting to about $200,000,000 per year placed upon the purchasers of automobiles and trucks.

MR. MILLS'S "TRIFLE" TAX

His proposed rates are a 5 per cent sales tax placed upon the purchaser of an automobile, a 3 per cent tax on trucks, and a 2½ per cent tax on repair parts and accessories. These "trifles" would place an intolerable burden upon the auto manufacturers and upon the purchasers of autos.

The auto manufacturers spend a vast amount of money in research because they figure that if they cut the cost of the production of the auto by only $50 they increase tremendously their sales, yet Mr. Mills proposed to offset these aids and economies by his "trifle" tax.

It is proper to place the responsibility for the auto-tax proposal upon Mr. Mills alone, because it is the understanding of prominent leaders of the auto industry that neither the President nor even Secretary Mellon sponsored the tax whole-heartedly or enthusiastically and that their consent to consider it as an administration proposal was forced upon them by Mr. Mills, who has always been the bitter and uncompromising enemy of the automobile industry. When he was a Member of Congress from New York Mr. Mills filled pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with his savage attacks upon the key industry of the country, namely, the automobile industry, and upon a means of cheap and rapid transportation which is of the highest importance to developing the Republic and lightening the burden of tens of millions of the American people.

FIERCE COMPETITION

Mr. Mills criticized from 1923 on the automobile industry as not being governed by economic laws nor the laws of supply and demand and the same laws which govern other industries, because it made a few men very rich and captains of industry in a shorter time than the leaders of other industries.

I led the fight against Mr. Mills in the House in 1923 and 1924, and I pointed out that there is nothing supernatural about the automobile industry, and that it is governed by the same economic laws as other industries and commodities, and predicted that while there were 300 automobile companies in 1924, that in a few years honest but fierce competition would cut the number in a startling fashion. To-day I have not the figures available, but there are probably not more than 30 automobile companies in this country. It shows the tremendous mortality since Mr. Mills made his intelligent analysis in 1924. In other words, there has been about a 90 per cent mortality, and about 270 automobile companies have gone to the wall, bringing ruin to many investors and sponsors.

To-day there are captains in the automobile industry who are facing absolute ruin and are making desperate efforts to save their plants for the benefit of the country, as well as for themselves and for thousands of their workingmen. Two years ago more than one of these captains of industry could conservatively say that he was worth $100,000,000 or $200,000,000. To-day no business man in the country is more worried or harassed than these automobile manufacturers who face absolute ruin.

Some of the leading automobile dealers of the country who two years ago rated their wealth at over a million dollars now say that they probably can not hold out more than a year before being forced into bankruptcy or retirement.

The dealers with their regiments of sales agents face the future bravely, they hold their weekly pep meetings and tackle their problems with terrific force, acute intelligence, and an unfaltering courage, but nevertheless they are not selling the cars.

AUTO INDUSTRY NOT SELFISH

But if you want to hear a real scream of heartfelt rage and agony, you repeat to them Mr. Mills's glib statement about his devastating tax proposal being a mere "trifle." Also, in Mr. Mills's statement of December 29, 1931, he accuses Members of Congress of "doubtful morality" in their tax proposals; but what of the "doubtful morality" of Mr. Mills in singling out only one transportation industry for tremendous taxes? He refused to propose a tax on other transportation interests which compete with the automobile industries. The United States Government, and rightfully so, is granting heavy subsidies to the airplane industry, and directly and indirectly is spending many millions of dollars in developing both the lighter-than-air and heavier-than-air craft. The mail subsidy alone amounts to $20,000,000 per year, but the automobile leaders do not complain of that nor do they suggest a sales tax on passenger or freight aircraft—mark you, neither does Mr. Mills. The auto people rejoice in that.

NOT ATTACKING COMPETITORS

The railroads were granted by the United States Government billions of dollars in real estate and in land grants, but no one ever heard the automobile leaders complain of those subsidies. Nor have they heard the automobile leaders propose a sales tax on freight or passenger cars, Pullmans, private cars, or locomotives. Neither has Mr. Mills proposed a sales tax on these transportation utilities. The automobile leaders rejoice in that.

The United States Government has spent over a billion dollars of the taxpayers' money on rivers and harbors, inland waterways, canals, locks, and so forth, but the automobile leaders have not complained of that. They have never suggested a sales tax on freight or passenger vessels or any form of tolls through canals or locks. Neither has Mr. Mills done so, to our knowledge. The automobile leaders rejoice at that.

Mr. Mills predicted in the hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee when he was a member thereof that if the automobile taxes were killed through the protests of men like myself, that the country would never see these sales taxes put back again on the automobile industry in peace times. He knew the Congress would not reestablish these unjust and exorbitant taxes, because it would be committing a mistake if it did.

A BATTLE TO THE END

But, meantime, the automobile industry and its friends are taking nothing for granted and will continue their resistance to Mr. Mills's auto-tax plan to their utmost. The 26,000,000 owners of automobiles and trucks in this country and the probable purchasers of new cars will be mobilized to give voice to their protests to their Congressmen and Senators. The 11 great automotive organizations, including the owners of cars, the manufacturers, the accessory, taxicab, rubber, and bus interests, and so forth, will protect themselves.

The farmers and those living outside the cities and villages have found the automobile and its development of good roads their best friend, and representatives of the farm organizations are swinging into the fight against Mr. Mills's proposal even as they did in 1923 and 1924 and have within the past few days already denounced the tax before the Ways and Means Committee.

Victory seems assured for the owners of automobiles and trucks, but they and their representatives will take no chance on anything being slipped over on them and will not relax their vigilance.

AUTO TAX NOT A TRIFLE

To prove that Mr. Mills's proposed auto taxes are not a trifle take the production figures of 1931 for passenger cars, motor trucks, and parts, tires, and accessories, and they show that Mr. Mills's proposed taxes would result in a revenue of $78,200,000.

But 1931 was a bad year, and even with difficult times the industry thinks it will sell 10 per cent more cars this year.

However, there are at least 6,000,000 cars being operated to-day in the United States which should be replaced by new cars, as they are antiquated and quite worn out. In good, prosperous years Mr. Mills's proposed taxes will run $200,000,000 or more per year.

On this 1931 production, I insert the following table to show just how the taxes in detail would be raised:

Passenger cars	2,045,000
Wholesale value	$1,175,000,000.00
Average value	575.00
Tax, at 5 per cent	28.75
Total tax	58,750,000.00
Motor trucks	420,000
Wholesale value	$260,000,000.00
Average value	619.00
Tax, at 3 per cent	18.57
Total tax	7,800,000.00
Parts, tires, and accessories	666,000,000
Tax, at 2½ per cent	$16,650,000.00
Total tax	83,200,000.00
Deduct for Canadian sales	5,000,000.00
	78,200,000.00

In conclusion, remember that there are three parts to the automobile tax. It is absolutely true that a tax on motor trucks is the most indefensible of all these three taxes, because the motor truck by the wildest flight of fancy or imagination can not be considered a luxury or semiluxury.

Moreover, the tax on parts, tires, and accessories is a misfortune or nuisance tax. If a man breaks a part or wrecks a tire, he is charged a tax for its replacement on his misfortune.

When I led the fight to kill these three forms of taxes in 1923 I found that the entering wedges were the motor-truck tax and the parts tax, as members of the Ways and Means Committee were forced to open their minds to the truth that these taxes are absolutely indefensible from any economic or patriotic standpoint.

The tax on passenger cars is, of course, highly indefensible when other fields of taxation are left untouched. It should be only assessed in war time, as Ogden Mills practically admitted in 1928 when he said that if Congress killed these automobile taxes they could never be assessed again in this country in peace time.

AN INVITATION FROM FLORIDA

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, we are rapidly approaching the Christmas season, which is the most joyous and greatest of all. Significant to all civilized Christian people in what it means to them, somehow at this season of the year there is a different feeling in the hearts of all mankind—that feeling of the love of home and the highest spiritual sentiment. I judge that many of you look forward to spending these Yuletide hours in the quietness and pleasure of your own hearthstone; but to those of you who may find this impossible I extend a hearty invitation to come to Florida and there enjoy to the fullest extent the pleasures and contentment of my wonderful State. The best roads in the world find their way from here throughout all parts of Florida. The railroads are offering you reduced rates with best accommodations and will carry you there in 18 hours. A direct air line from here to all parts of Florida will carry you there in a very short while. At this season of the year fresh and nourishing vegetables are plenteous, her luscious fruits are abundant. A general harvest is rich, and her springs, thousands of them, are gushing forth daily millions of gallons of that wholesome, transparent, and God-given fluid sparkling with purity and virtue. One thousand and three hundred miles of coast waters with beaches are there, where the tide ebbs and flows and the gentle ocean breeze will sweep from your brow the gloom of your daily cares and troubles. If you should be inclined to play and frivolity, you will find playgrounds wide, with strains of sweet music to enrage your heart's desire. But if you would live in the sublime when the hush of night surrounds the universe, your ears will be called by the chimes ranging forth from the Bok Singing Tower when its bells peel forth the Christmas carols. There in this salubrious climate you will enjoy the bright sunshine of the clear atmosphere so charged with the life-giving ozone. When the rays of the golden sun fade in the west a pale moon will mount the eastern horizon and shed its silvery sheen upon you, upon the trees, and upon the lakes and flowers. Then, my friends, in conclusion, I extend to you:

GREETINGS FROM FLORIDA

From palm-fringed shores and sunlit bays,
Where the lakes like jewels glimmer blue,
I am extending you this greeting,
'Cause in Florida friends are waiting for you.

BALANCE THE BUDGET

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have had a tentative arrangement with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] that we should each have about 20 minutes on the side, to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois and myself, and that this would conclude the debate to-day. If this is agreeable to the gentleman from Illinois, I shall yield the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] 20 minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a little more time than that; say, 30 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I have felt that it was time that some one put before the country what I believe to be the absolutely necessary policy for the United States Government to follow if we are to bring back prosperity. Everyone will remember what criticism was made of England, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, and other countries of the world when they were spending more than their income. Everyone will remember that things in each of those countries, while they went along in that extravagant way, were in absolute turmoil and that no progress was possible toward prosperity for the people, but that their condition continually became worse and worse. The more they became obliged to borrow the worse they became off.

In 1926, in France, under the leadership of Raymond Poincaire, the war-time President of France, the budget was balanced. Her expenses were reduced to come within the amount of revenue she was able to raise by taxing her own people, and France began immediately to climb toward prosperity.

The nearer Italy has come to that condition, the more she has been respected and the better off her people have been.

Germany, with continuous borrowings and with an unbalanced budget, has become worse and worse. Although she spent tremendous sums for public works with borrowed money, conditions have continually become worse and worse.

Ramsay MacDonald drifted along in England until her situation reached the point where he and his party faced absolute political disaster and where England was upon the rocks. Mr. MacDonald had intelligence enough and courage enough to cut loose from a policy which all history has shown to be disastrous and fatal, and to slash the expenses of the British Government and raise the taxes to the point where they would yield the greatest possible revenue. When Mr. MacDonald took his firm stand they reduced the salaries of government employees 25 per cent, and on top of that England went off the gold standard, so that the real cut in salaries and the real cut of every employee in England was not 25 per cent but nearer 50 per cent. There was a cut of 25 per cent direct and at least another of 25 per cent indirect, and a cut in all salaries and prices of 25 per cent due to going off the gold standard.

Can we not take a lesson from England's experience and from the history of the world? Can we not see that if we go on as England did and as other countries did, and continue spending more than our income, that we are heading for a terrible disaster? Can we not see that if we do not stop spending money and get all of our expenses within our income that next year when we sit down to make up the appropriation bills and our Budget, our situation will be much worse?

I appreciate that mine perhaps is a lone voice in the wilderness, but I am expressing the sentiment and issuing a warning that I believe needs to be issued to all America at the present time. That warning is to balance our Budget or face disaster.

Balance our Budget now and we shall have taken the first great step toward prosperity, toward the upbuilding of our business system, toward the restoration of that prosperity which has been the byword of America for 150 years.

Some people have proposed a tremendous bond issue to carry on public improvements. Where are we going to sell the bonds? With an issue of $1,300,000,000 of temporary bonds of one year, for which bids were opened yesterday, the demand only exceeded the supply by a few million dollars. We have reached the position here in America, where cities have gone so far with building programs that they are now beyond the debt limits and in most cases can not borrow any more money on bonds.

The States are rapidly approaching the same position. It will take just one more year of foolish appropriations and unnecessary bond issues to put the Federal Government in exactly that position. For one, I am violently opposed to seeing my country in that situation.

My own vote and my own effort will be spent entirely in the direction of preventing that situation from arising. We must appropriate such funds as are absolutely necessary to maintain the national defense without any waste and such sums as are necessary to make the Government function. We must also meet the necessary governmental obligations on veterans' relief which is now provided for by law. Beyond the necessary items we must cut and cut to the bone.

I do not advocate the cutting of salaries except as a last resort, but I submit this: It is much better for us who are on the Federal pay roll to take a 10 per cent cut this year, and perhaps a smaller cut in the smaller salaries, than to have to take a 25 per cent or larger cut next year because we have not met our responsibilities. It is both good business from our own standpoint and good patriotism to meet our situation now.

After this we must turn around and try to raise what money we can. We are not going to be able to do as we did in war time and attempt to place the tax on larger profits which were then being made, because there is at the present time no such thing as large incomes on a large scale such as we had in war time and have had in the past five or six years, and we need none of us fool ourselves with the idea that there is such an amount of income as there was in the years of 1925–1929, inclusive. It is not going to be a case of what tax is scientific or what tax is politically expedient, but what tax is going to be necessary which will produce money.

If we can balance our Budget or come so close to it that we are not ashamed to look ourselves in the face, we shall have made the most far-reaching step forward toward American prosperity.

Let us have courage and patriotism; let us stand up to the rack and meet America's situation face to face; let us take one sound, forward, patriotic step; let us put demagoguery behind us and by means of sound legislation, well considered, lead the way to American prosperity. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following date the President approved and signed joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

On December 21, 1931:

H. J. Res. 141. Joint resolution to provide additional appropriations for the Veterans' Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932; and

H. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for the Employment Service, Department of Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD my remarks on unemployment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FEAR. Mr. Speaker, two schools of thought are seeking to steer our country off the rocks of unemployment. One school says that our unemployed, whether 4,000,000 men and women or double that number, must depend upon local charities aided by the Red Cross organization that has left its benevolent impress on the disasters and suffering found in every land.

No one will seek to discredit the charities afforded in national emergencies by the Red Cross, Near East Relief, American Relief, and other associations. The latter extended a helping hand to Russian famine districts in 1921, to Austria, China, and to all countries of warring Europe indiscriminately. Its aid and benevolences, more than its soldiers and sailors, have left for us lasting gratitude on the part of Europe and Asia.

From the lips of Chicherin and other high officials of Russia, from President Michael Heinich, of Austria, from Cuno and Hermes, of Germany, in her dark hours following the war, from Sun Yat Sen, the great patriot of China, and others, when in those countries, I have heard expressions of their gratitude to our own country for relief during their hour of need.

These expressions repeated many times elsewhere leave no uncertainty of American leadership in the great field of world charities. America has responded nobly to every cry for help from the distressed of every land, including our own.

As a joint partner in this humanitarian work, supplying an emergency Federal, State, and local aid supplementing temporary charity, I offer a bill that amplifies benevolences by furnishing constructive labor with just compensation for a jobless army.

PROVISIONS OF BILL

My bill (H. R. 4552) for meeting the unemployment situation provides for a permanent Federal commission of three Cabinet officers acting ex officio with a skeleton organization, excepting in cases of emergency, when the Federal Government is requested to aid local unemployment.

It provides whenever petition is received from any State for contribution to meet local unemployment with notice that the State has made like provision for an unemployment agency, the Federal commission may consider applications from any municipal corporation in that State for contribution toward the construction of specified local municipal improvements. The Federal commission may contribute not to exceed 20 per cent of the cost of the local improvement to be matched by 20 per cent contributed by the State government, the balance to be borne by the municipality for which the improvement is to be constructed.

Provisions for safeguarding the money so contributed by the commission, character of the local improvement, control and manner of payment of money and other requirements are briefly set forth.

The Federal Government by contributing $100,000,000 in any great emergency would thus employ five times that amount in the construction of municipal improvements; the State through its cooperation and equal contribution would assume supervision of construction and thus avoid what might be undue demands by any one locality.

Restriction in the amount paid by the Federal Government of $1,000,000 to any municipality and of $5,000,000 in any one State from the $100,000,000 appropriation would thus provide five times that amount and safeguard any attempt to absorb the appropriation by one or more States. This aid would be in force only during the declared emergency. Not to exceed $50,000 shall be expended annually for commission's investigations, excepting during the period of the declared emergency.

It answers the proposition that a man or woman asking for work should not be compelled to depend on public charities or beg for aid when out of a job. Wives, children, and other dependents must beg for that aid to-day, and humiliation in so doing is not understood by those blessed with a job or competence.

THE RIGHT TO WORK

Our declaration of rights asserted that all men are born equal, with inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. For those rights colonists fought at Valley Forge and Yorktown. By what reasoning can we justify sending a willing worker to the souphouse or to some other charity when work, not charity, is needed and asked for?

Workmen's insurance, unemployment insurance, and other aid is all preferable to begging for charity, but I submit these do not meet the requirements of those asking for work instead of charity.

From the lips of English laborers, when in that country, I learned their belief that the "dole" encourages idleness and dishonesty by substituting financial support for work. Instead of building a self-dependent manhood and womanhood for citizenship, the dole was declared to encourage slothfulness, hypocrisy, and dishonesty. However worthy its purpose, I learned that was the result.

ACCUMULATION OF WEALTH

All the millionaires in this country of ours could have been counted on the fingers of two hands, possibly of one hand, a century ago. To-day their number reaches many thousands, while men possessing $1,000,000,000 in wealth are beginning to rival in number our millionaires when the Constitution was adopted. Although in this time of business depression few men know their exact holdings, which illustrates the adage that riches have wings, money is only useful for the comforts and opportunities it brings to its holder and to the people who are permitted to enjoy it.

Neither a billionaire nor a millionaire who has acquired his wealth under our beneficent laws needs vast wealth, for when our forefathers wrote that all men have inalienable rights of life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness, they intended to say that every man, not the few, had full protection under our law to those rights.

It can not be said that a thousand-fold all the wealth of Crœsus must be kept intact and protected to one man and charitable relief afforded another without inviting the inquiry, Is that the purpose of our widely heralded democracy?

In this day of financial extremes, where men of wealth satisfy their consciences by dribbling small charities to keep other equally good Americans from starving, we may well ask, Have we assured to those in need rights promised by our forefathers when establishing this Government?

Men of great wealth generally place a large share of their wealth in tax-free securities, or make large gifts to maintain others in luxury and so escape estate taxes. They receive the protection of this Government in acquiring that wealth. Should they be relieved from paying for that protection when hoarding their wealth?

I have no envy for any man possessing great wealth. He misses much in life for the enjoyment he gets in accumulating money. To cite an extreme case, the miser gets happiness out of his habits and his sacrifices for wealth, but few people envy him that joy. We are dealing with rights when that wealth is permitted to accumulate and is protected, to the exclusion of rights to work and live by millions not blessed with food or shelter.

MEN WHO ASKED FOR JOBS

It is generally understood that Secretary Mellon, by threats of resignation and of ultimate national financial confusion, compelled Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover to oppose and veto veteran compensation legislation. Its effect on the subject in hand is disclosed by the following extract from a speech in the House on February 16, 1931. Quoting from the committee hearings of January 31, I said:

Appeals for relief of unemployment by veterans and tales of need do not go to Mr. Mellon, where they would be unanswered, but to General Hines.

I quote from the committee hearings of January 31:

General HINES. I estimate between 200,000 and 300,000 ex-service men are out of employment. * * *

Mr. FREAR. You have previously stated that not over 50 per cent, if given the option, would release their certificates, so that 50 per cent will not be forced; is that right?

General HINES. That is correct.

Mr. FREAR. The proportion that will be forced is simply those out of work, in distress, with their families in need. Now, what provisions are we to make to care for those people, other than by the bills which are now before us?

General HINES. I indicated, Congressman, I felt we should make an effort to get them into employment * * * The Department of Labor, with the cooperation of the Veterans' Administration and the service organizations, indicate the result of our combined efforts * * * that from May until December of 35,974 veterans they were able to place in employment 13,253. An additional 17,439 have been referred to employers but to date it has not resulted in getting a job.

Mr. FREAR. On the basis of those figures 22,000 of the 35,000 are still out of employment.

General HINES. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Now, what proportion of the total number would you say are in this third group that are in distress or in need?

General HINES. I think I limited it to two or three hundred thousand.

Mr. FREAR. These combined efforts, as you have stated, have provided 13,000 with employment out of two or three hundred thousand. What are we to do for the balance of those two or three hundred thousand?

General HINES. It is our duty to continue our special effort to get the veteran employment. * * *

Mr. FREAR. But if we have only secured 13,000 positions out of two or three hundred thousand we have not made much progress. * * * Of course, they are put in competition with the great number out of employment who are not ex-service men. That is one reason why 13,000, the number provided for, is so limited, is it not?

General HINES. Yes.

If Secretary of the Treasury Alexander Hamilton, No. 1, had said to General Washington, first in the hearts of his countrymen, that the survivors of Valley Forge, when asking for bread, should be given a stone or shown the soup house, that great patriot, whose bicentennial we are about to honor, would doubtless have replied that Aaron Burr must hurry his sunrise meeting.

Patriotism has been so diluted since those days by foreign investments, foreign entanglements, and war profiteering that the second Hamilton, although rolling in wealth, enhanced by the World War and sacrifice of veterans now in need, disclosed a different atmosphere when he says, in effect, a soldier must depend on charity. I am using his case as an object lesson and not because of any prejudice against the individual.

That eminent financier was aware last year of the fact that 287,000 veterans, once ruthlessly taken from their jobs to fight our battles, were then out of employment, without hope of jobs; that families had suffered mentally and financially during their absence in war; that these families in many cases are now dependent on charity; that I O U's of Uncle Sam in the form of Government insurance certificates, the best security in the world, were offered by Congress and that loans, not gifts, were asked to tide these men over a great business depression. To placate the present Secretary of the Treasury it was agreed by Congress, over protests, that the wealthiest government in the world might shave interest rates so that the Treasury would make an actual profit from these loans to veterans.

That relief bill was vetoed, with a dismal prospect of crowding soup houses already the refuge of several million other Americans looking for jobs. Congress, irrespective of politics, voted not to throw out the pleas of men who fought, to save Mellon's millions. In so doing, to a mild degree, it reflected the immortal spirit of the Father of our Country when again it overruled a President's veto.

Veterans asking for a job were to be handed a soup ticket. That was and is Americanism down to date. Congress must return to an Americanism which declares "work," not "charity," is the right of every man, so far as the Government can provide.

No system can be devised that will prevent injustices or suffering, but it is well to consider extremes when charity is offered as a remedy for the needs of millions of people out of employment and who want work.

MEN WHO GOT JOBS

Present conditions were disclosed when the press recently reported that a call in one city for 250 men to dig ditches for sewers caused ten times that number to stand in line during the night, including many white-collared men, all looking for jobs to dig dirt at nominal wages. A small riot was precipitated by the excess of labor asking for that work.

Senator LA FOLLETTE's committee has been holding hearings during the recess and has many valuable data on which to frame a bill or bills to meet the present unemployment emergency, but I have had the temerity to offer a suggestion which may properly furnish a basis for additional permanent relief.

A Federal unemployment commission to deal with the problem might well follow the plan of Federal highway aid. That commission should be authorized in emergency to extend possibly not to exceed 20 per cent of the cost of new local municipal improvements, providing the State in which a municipality is located contributed a like amount of State money.

This would leave 60 per cent of the actual cost of the improvement to be borne by the municipality. Such improvements, when an emergency was declared to exist, would extend from ordinary permanent municipal improvements to projects for housing and otherwise caring for the welfare of the people. The work to be performed under joint supervision after the project, including wages and amount of joint contribution, had been determined and agreed to.

Large cities that have a proportionately large surplus of unemployed labor would thus be relieved from a portion of the excess burden of caring for unemployed who flock there in times of depression.

Surrounding restrictions should be required with limitations of character of work to receive contribution, amount to be expended, with an additional provision that Federal officials be required to approve every project, its necessity, and usual building conditions in manner similar so far as applicable to present authorizations for Federal building construction throughout the States.

Federal aid would be extended only in cases of unemployment emergency, to be determined by the administrative board acting under definite provisions of law, to avoid extravagance or unauthorized expenditures. Such Federal aid would be based upon cooperation by the State and local municipal unit. Details could be provided for safeguarding the Federal Government and a plan could be developed to meet the necessities of a situation that everyone concedes demands vigorous treatment.

EXPENSE, HOW BORNE

What will be the expense and how will it be met?

Under charitable contributions those best able to pay generally shirk their full duty. Under income, estate, gift, and like tax measures those best able to pay must give support to their Government. Evasions or exemptions due to trusts, gifts, tax-free securities, or other provisions that prevent the Government from collecting the full amount paid by ordinary taxpayers are frequent. Remembering that our Federal tax rates are below those of practically all other countries, a tax based on ability to pay would be just to those taxed. That is the present proposal of the administration.

That is a separate responsibility of Congress and an increased tax to balance the Federal Budget should give priority to the establishment of such an unemployment bureau. Highways, waterways, irrigation, and other like proposed expenditures, especially where undertaken without proportionate local contribution, should wait in times of stress because slight scrutiny will often disclose doubtful utility and the fact that actual manual labor on those projects is not to be compared with the harvest of profits ordinarily reaped by contractors using modern machinery. The right to work is superior to community benefits claimed to be gained. Frequently much public money is wasted under the guise of public "improvements," and Congress as well as the President has a responsibility for the wise expenditure of money, second only to the prior right of work for those in need.

With war-debt payments already anticipated by the Treasury it would not embarrass this Government to ease the present depression by a bond issue, if need be, that would be oversubscribed by those who are looking for safe investments. Until industries are again on a normal basis this course would give needed relief.

If relatively more important expenditures are to be considered, it would be well to delay, if not permanently postpone, a naval-parity program which seeks to secure a billion dollars from the Federal Treasury for naval parity with Great Britain in addition to an annual drain on the Treasury of three-quarters of a billion dollars now paid for maintaining our Army and Navy. That tax drain to-day is more than double the cost of our defense measures prior to the World War, and greater than is paid by any other country for "national defense." Other like extravagances are familiar to every Member.

By payment of $1,000,000,000 toward unemployment in one year, a proper investment, the Federal Government could secure a contribution of four times that amount from the States and municipalities, or a total of $5,000,000,000. Probably one-tenth of $5,000,000,000 that could thus be raised for any emergency would be sufficient to meet ordinary demands, but work should be given to those who ask for it, where possible to furnish.

A contribution of $100,000,000 from the Federal Government, with a like sum from the State and three times that amount from the municipality, would furnish employment for 2,500,000 people for several months at modest compensation, and double that Federal contribution would provide 5,000,000 unemployed with work on useful improvements throughout the average period of depression. Compared with appeals to charities, this would be a far better method of relief than to provide simple gratuities which would not approach those amounts during the same period nor be equitably contributed by those best able to pay.

The blessings of individualism have long been held up to the world, but when men and women ask for work instead of charity it is time for us to give attention to our own public methods that excite criticism from abroad.

The suggestion is here proffered of a constructive plan that may be further developed with a protest against forcing self-respecting people to line up with down and outers, by pleading for charity, when work and not charity is asked. Our country can and should face the problem squarely, by making provision for the present and for future emergencies that are sure to come.

BETTER INVEST OUR MONEY IN AMERICAN JOBS

One word in conclusion: The Commerce Department's Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce reports the United States and its citizens hold approximately $24,500,000,000 in foreign investments, or $200 per capita for every man, woman, and child, including 5,000,000 unemployed, 95 per cent of whom have no part of that enormous investment.

The total is divided into $7,740,000,000 cash value (?) of $11,640,000,000 war debts when whittled down to date with likelihood of more whittling to be done.

Fifteen billion dollars is in private long-term investments in factories, mines, public utilities, and various foreign government bonds and $1,725,759,000 in short-term credits. Of these investments Canada has $3,941,693,000; Europe, $4,929,277,000; South America, $3,041,926,000; and Mexico, Central America, West Indies, Africa, Asia, and Oceania have practically all the rest of the $15,000,000,000. If our financiers can place their securities in such large quantities abroad, it would be well to reserve a portion here for the use of America's unemployed.

To get a picture of the moderate tax paid by the American, compared to that paid by his English cousin, the last tax proposal by Snowden in England reached 5 shillings (or 25 per cent) on the pound as the basic income tax. Ten per cent increase in the surtax on higher incomes is also one method of distributing wealth in conservative England.

Sixteen cents per pound on smoking tobacco, 16 cents tax a gallon on gasoline, and similar heavy English taxes are then imposed. A small fraction of that tax rate would provide work for all of America's unemployed.

It is sometimes comforting to know that misery has company, and in these days of business depression when all the world is affected, the situation does not look so bad when we realize that, after all, ours is the best country in many ways, and it is only a matter of better distribution of wealth by taxation that is asked for in time of need and a contribution from those best able to pay to provide work for those who ask for it and not for charity.

I attach hereto bill (H. R. 4552) that provides for a permanent Federal unemployment commission.

H. R. 4552

A bill to provide for cooperation with the States and with municipal corporations for the relief of unemployment by extending Federal aid toward the construction of municipal improvements

Be it enacted, etc.—

FEDERAL COMMISSION FOR THE RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

SECTION 1. That a Federal commission for the relief of unemployment (hereinafter referred to as the commission) is hereby created, to be composed of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor. Two members of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and the commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. The President shall designate the chairman of the commission.

EMPLOYEES AND ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

SEC. 2. That the commission shall appoint, without reference to the civil service act of January 16, 1883, an executive secretary, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year; and may employ, subject to the said civil service act and the classification act of March 4, 1923, as amended, such experts and other personal service as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of this act. The commission shall occupy rooms assigned to it by the Public Buildings Commission; or if no such rooms can be assigned, the commission may rent suitable rooms in the District of Columbia. The commission is authorized to purchase, through the General Supply Committee, such furniture, stationery, and other supplies as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of this act. For the expenses referred to in this section there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary, not to exceed $100,000 for any one fiscal year: Provided, That such appropriation shall not be expended at a rate in excess of $50,000 a year except during such times as an emergency has been declared to exist, under section 3 of this act.

UNEMPLOYMENT EMERGENCIES

SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act relating to Federal aid shall apply with respect to any State only during an emergency condition in the unemployment situation in such State; the existence of the emergency condition being declared by the commission, subject to the approval of the President; but no such condition shall be declared to exist in any State until after some duly constituted official of that State has requested the commission to make such declaration. The commission, subject to the approval of the President, may declare the termination of an emergency condition in any State; and shall make such declaration whenever so requested by the legislature of the State or by the governor, if the legislature has not been in session at any time during the preceding 60 days.

APPLICATION FOR FEDERAL AID

SEC. 4. That during any emergency condition in the unemployment situation in any State, any municipal corporation in such State may apply to the commission for Federal aid for the construction of permanent improvements, and the commission is authorized to grant such Federal aid under the following conditions:

(a) The Federal aid shall be limited to 20 per cent of the estimated total cost of the improvement.

(b) The State must guarantee, through some commission or other agency duly authorized by the legislature thereof, that it will contribute toward the same improvement, an amount at least equal to the Federal contribution, and that it will be responsible for the completion of the improvement, in case of any default on the part of the municipal corporation to comply with its obligations under this act.

(c) The municipal corporation must provide for defraying all cost of the improvement in excess of the Federal and State contributions; and the commission must satisfy itself before approving the application that this provision constitutes a valid legal obligation on the part of the municipal corporation.

(d) The application must be accompanied by detailed plans and specifications for the proposed improvement, including an estimate of cost; and no Federal aid shall be granted until the plans, specifications, and estimate of cost have been approved by the commission.

(e) The commission shall have complete discretion to refuse to grant Federal aid to any municipal corporation in respect to any specific application; but the reasons for such refusal shall be communicated in writing to the municipal corporation.

(f) The proposed improvement set forth in the application must be of a permanent character, and may be in the nature of facilities for water, light, gas, power or sewage service, municipal buildings, or dwelling houses to be the property of the municipal corporation.

(g) Before any of the Federal appropriations are expended the commission must be satisfied that the State aid is actually available, that any necessary bond issues have been validly authorized and the proceeds of the bonds made available, and that both the State and municipal agencies for the expenditure of the funds are effectively organized.

(h) The agreement providing for Federal aid shall contain such provisions as to methods of construction, wages, and other details as the commission may think necessary or desirable; and the commission may withhold any Federal contribution if in its judgment such provisions have not been complied with. No contribution of Federal funds shall be made except proportionately with funds advanced by the State until the improvement is completed and the action by the commission shall not be subject to review by any court, but only to an appeal to Congress for relief.

APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 5. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 4 of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $100,000,000: Provided, That not more than $1,000,000 shall be contributed in aid of any one municipal corporation, nor more than $5,000,000 for municipal corporations in any one State in a single year.

SEC. 6. The commission is authorized to call upon all agencies of the Federal Government for information or advice in connection with the operation of this act, and the commission shall from time to time make detailed recommendations to Congress for further legislation needed in order to carry out more effectually the purpose of this act, and shall at the beginning of each session of Congress make a full report of all expenditures made under section 4 of this act subsequent to the period covered by its last preceding report. The commission shall meet at any time at the call of the chairman or of the President; and the chairman shall call a meeting within 10 days after a request from the governor of any State for a declaration of an emergency condition in the unemployment situation in such State.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a radio speech I made last night, and to include a letter from Thomas Kirby, national legislative chairman of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following speech delivered by myself over the Columbia Broadcasting System Monday evening, December 21, 1931, on the subject, "Why the adjusted-service certificates should be paid in cash now."

Are veterans of the World War "bonus racketeers," "Treasury raiders," and are they trying to bankrupt the Government? Many such charges have been brought against them. Many such odious terms have been applied to their demands. If their requests from the Government are unreasonable, such charges are at least corroborated. If, on the other hand, the veterans are reasonable in their demands and are supported by both justice and right, the charges are unauthorized and the ones making them are entitled to have their motives impugned.

H. R. 1 FOR FULL PAYMENT

Congress should immediately pass a bill authorizing the full cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates. My bill, H. R. 1, introduced the first day of Congress, provides for full cash payment without deducting interest on prior loans since October 1, 1931. This proposal is indorsed by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, Fleet Reserve Association, and many other organizations.

NOT BONUS CERTIFICATES

Three million six hundred thousand veterans of the World War hold adjusted-service certificates. They are not bonus certificates and do not represent a bonus; they represent a just and honest debt confessed and acknowledged by the Congress of the United States to the veterans of the World War for services rendered. They range in value from $126 to $1,590 each; the average certificate is for $1,000. The holders of these certificates reside in every nook and corner of America.

COMPOUND INTEREST WILL CONSUME REMAINDER

Two million five hundred thousand of these veterans, or about 75 per cent, have borrowed $1,300,000,000 by using their certificates as collateral security. They are paying 4½ per cent interest, compounded annually, for their own money. They are now charged with being unpatriotic for objecting to the remaining one-half of their certificates being consumed by compound interest. They are told the money will be needed by them much worse in 1945. A veteran holding a certificate of the average size, who has borrowed the limit allowed by law, as these veterans have borrowed, and does not pay any part of it back, will be able to negotiate another loan on his certificate in 1944 for $16.55; the next year, 1945, he will be given $66.25 and his certificate will be canceled. Compound interest will consume the remainder.

Two billion two hundred million dollars will pay the balance due on all the certificates. Only the uninformed or the veterans' enemies contend that the Government can not conveniently make this payment now. The Government can be saved tens of millions of dollars a year in administration expense by making the payment now, and at the same time save the veterans, their widows, and orphans tens of millions of dollars annually in compound interest. For a veteran to be required to pay interest for his own money is bad enough, but to require him to pay "compound interest" is adding insult to injury.

The veterans' problem is the problem of the plain people. Most of the veterans belong to that great middle class. It is that class that has done so much for this country. They are the ones who build our country in time of peace and who save our country in time of war. If they are made prosperous, everybody will be prosperous; they have the consuming power.

The plain people will be greatly benefited by the payment of the adjusted-service certificates. A benefit to them is a benefit to the Nation.

OTHERS RECEIVED ADJUSTED PAY

The principle of adjusted pay was invoked by our Government for the benefit of others who rendered war services. The railroad owners and war contractors were given billions of dollars by the Government immediately after the war in adjusted compensation. Federal employees, drawing $2,500 a year or less during the war, drew $1,200 and $1,400 each as adjusted compensation—this payment costing the Government $300,000,000. Foreign countries were given $10,000,000,000 in the adjustment of their debts with us and they used our money to pay their own soldiers not only adjusted compensation but bonuses aggregating as high as $7,290 each. Remember, the railroad owners, war contractors, and Federal employees were paid by our Government in cash, and ten billions were given to foreign countries at a time when our Nation owed $26,000,000,000. No one asked the question, "Where are we going to get the money?" Our Nation owes at this time $10,000,000,000 less than it owed at that time.

ACT OF 1924

Congress passed a law in 1924 which was known as the adjusted compensation act. The report of the committees of Congress reporting this bill, both House and Senate, and the copy of the proceedings of both Houses in the discussion of the measure disclose that by the enactment of this law Congress intended to confess and acknowledge to the veterans of the World War a debt for extra pay during the time of their military service equal to $1 a day extra pay for service in the United States and $1.25 a day extra pay for service overseas. These reports and discussions further disclose that the amount was arrived at by taking into consideration the difference between what the average private soldier, sailor, or marine received for his service at $1 a day and his food and clothing, which was furnished by the Government, and what the lowest paid laborer in America received as compensation during the war. This calculation enabled the lawmakers to come to the conclusion that the veterans were entitled to receive between $1 and $1.25 a day extra pay and resulted in allowing the men in domestic service $1 a day extra and the overseas men $1.25 a day extra.

Contrary to the belief of many people, the veterans of the World War are not asking Congress to give them one penny more than the $1 or $1.25 that has already been confessed. The veterans are not asking that the amount be raised; they are merely asking for the payment as of the time their services were rendered with a reasonable rate of interest since that time.

Is that an unreasonable request? No one can contend that it is.

Congress, in the passage of the act which confessed the debt to the veterans, provided that instead of paying them in cash, the amount due them would be increased by 25 per cent for waiting, and they would be given an endowment-insurance policy, due January 1, 1945, for an amount equal to what such a premium would purchase, according to the American Experience Table of Mortality, at 4 per cent interest, which was done. Under this act veterans were permitted to borrow from the Government, by using their policies as collateral security, a small amount each year, equal to about $2 a month on the average policy. On these loans the veteran was required to pay a rate of interest equal to 2 per cent above the rediscount rate effective in the Federal reserve district where the veteran resided. This resulted in the veterans being required to pay 6, 7, and 8 per cent interest, compounded annually, for their own money, which they paid for many years.

In the full-payment bill now pending the veterans are not asking for the 25 per cent increase for waiting—just the amount due at $1 and $1.25 a day as of the time the services were rendered, with a reasonable rate of interest since that time. The 25 per cent increase is omitted.

What is a reasonable rate of interest? The Government in charging the veterans 6, 7, and 8 per cent interest, compounded annually, for their own money admitted these amounts were reasonable; therefore, a request for 6 per cent interest, compounded annually is not unreasonable. That is all the bill calls for. If the veterans are paid the $1 and $1.25 a day with 6 per cent, compounded annually, from the time the services were rendered, each veteran was entitled to receive, October 1, 1931, an amount equal to the full face value of his adjusted-service certificate. Therefore the face or maturity value of all the adjusted-service certificates is long past due. They must be paid some time. If paid now, both veterans and the country will be benefited. The additional purchasing power such payment will afford is badly needed at this time.

HAS THE LAW AUTHORIZING LOANS OF 50 PER CENT UPON ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES CAUSED ANY PART OF THE TREASURY DEFICIT?

This charge is often made. It is not true. No part of the Treasury deficit has been caused by loans to veterans on their adjusted-service certificates. November 28, 1931, the Veterans' Administration furnished me with the latest information relative to these loans. This information discloses that a total of $1,173,330,971.37 has been loaned to veterans under both the old and new laws relating to loans; $537,339,791.76 loaned under the original act of 1924, when the debt was acknowledged; $635,891,179.61 has been loaned under the new act of 1931 authorizing a loan up to 50 per cent of the value of certificate.

None of this money has been loaned by the Treasury Department. It has all been advanced from two funds, as follows:

Adjusted-service certificate fund	$840,243,494.98
United States Government life-insurance fund	332,987,487.28

There is in the adjusted-service certificate fund at this time, after deducting the above amount, and which may be used to advance on additional loans, the sum of $153,925,720.

A letter from the Veterans' Administration to me, dated November 28, 1931, substantiates the statements I have made.

MISLEADING HEADLINES

During the past two or three days newspapers all over the Nation have carried this headline, "Veterans' bonus of $200,000,000 passed by Congress." One would immediately come to the conclusion that a new veterans' bonus bill has passed and that the veterans who have borrowed can now secure an additional sum on their certificates. Such is not the case. The President, anticipating that the adjusted-service certificate fund will become exhausted and that additional funds will be needed for the purpose of loaning veterans their own money at 4½ per cent interest, compounded annually, requested Congress to make the $200,000,000 available for that purpose. A veteran who has borrowed 50 per cent on his certificate is not affected by this legislation. He can not borrow an additional sum. The appropriation is for the purpose of granting additional loans to veterans who have not borrowed the limit allowed by law.

WHERE WILL WE GET THE MONEY TO PAY THE CERTIFICATES?

Our national debt is being retired too rapidly. Congress passed a law which established the policy of the Government in the retirement of this debt. Since the war was fought for posterity, Congress declared that the payment of the debt caused by the war should be borne, at least partly, by a future generation. The Secretary of the Treasury, contrary to the policy expressed by Congress, has paid $3,500,000,000 more on the national debt the past 10 years than Congress said should have been paid during that period of time. Congress can pay the adjusted-service certificates in full in cash now and our country's national debt will not be as great by over $1,000,000,000 as Congress, 10 years ago, contemplated that it should be at this time. Our national debt, compared to our national wealth, is insignificant and is nothing compared to the indebtedness of foreign countries. Our national debt is between sixteen and seventeen billions of dollars. Our national wealth is thirty times the amount of such debt.

HOW WILL THE MONEY BE SPENT?

Will the veterans waste the money? It is their money. They have a right to spend it for any purpose they choose. An investigation made by the Veterans' Administration for the purpose of discovering how the money was spent that was paid on the 50 per cent loans disclosed that 65 per cent was spent for comforts and necessities of life; 20 per cent for investment purposes, including payments on homes; 8 per cent on automobiles; and 7 per cent in a way that no practical benefits were realized therefrom. The average age of the veterans is 39½ years. They are married and have children. Almost a million of them are out of employment. They need the remaining half of their certificates much worse than the Government needs it in compound interest.

THE NATION WILL BE HELPED $18 PER CAPITA

If the remainder of the certificates are paid in full it will be the same as distributing $18 per capita all over the Nation. In a city of 1,000,000 people $18,000,000 will be paid to the veterans. This money will go immediately into the channels of trade. A veteran will pay his doctor bill, drug-store account, grocery bill, an installment on the furniture, a payment on the home, or possibly enjoy additional comforts and necessities of life. All the people in that city will be helped. The benefits will not be confined to the veterans and their families.

GET THE TRUTH TO THE PEOPLE

This is not a question of sympathy. It is a business proposition. A great principle is involved. That is, shall the Government liquidate this debt in the same way that debts owed by the Government to others are liquidated? If so, it should be paid in cash now. The veterans do not want sympathy, they want understanding. We will be victorious when the people understand that our request is both right and reasonable. Our problem is getting the truth to the people. The request for this payment does not come from veterans alone but from farmers, wage earners, manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, jobbers, business and professional men and woment, and all others who want a wrong righted and our Nation made prosperous.

FIGHT WILL CONTINUE

We have a just cause; we are right; the fight has just commenced, and it will continue until the certificates are paid in full.

It has been contended that the Disabled Veterans of the World War are not favorable to the proposal that the adjusted-service certificates be paid in full in cash now. The following letter is self-explanatory:

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR,
Washington, December 17, 1931.

Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PATMAN: In response to your request for confirmation as to the position of the Disabled American Veterans on the matter of adjusted-compensation-certificate legislation at this session, you are informed that the Disabled American Veterans of the World War stands for the immediate cash payment of this obligation.

This position has resulted from the action of the eleventh national convention of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War last June at Wilkes-Barre, hundreds of delegates representing every section of the country voting overwhelmingly to make this an item of the national legislative program. This was not a precipitate action from the floor but came after the legislative committee had deliberately considered numerous resolutions from various units.

In this connection the eligibility of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War can not be overemphasized. This is the only organization of any wars' disabled in the history of the Republic that has been federally recognized, and we have always been extremely jealous of our eligibility lists, which are limited exclusively to men whose disabilities resulted from their military or naval service.

As you are aware, the legislation at the last session came at a time when the distress among the disabled was not as severe as at present. I know it will be interesting to you to be informed that the first employment census of the disabled since the armistice was taken during the past summer under the guidance of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War. There was sent to every compensable man in America a questionnaire as to his employment status and the tabulation from these returns showed there were 75,000 service-connected disabled men without employment whose average compensation is less than $30 per month. It has been estimated that 20 per cent of the soldiers were married, while to-day 80 per cent of the veterans are married, and the vast majority of these have dependents. It is easy to visualize the distressful condition of these men at this time of depression so, if the legislation last year was justified, it is more so at present, so far as the war's disabled are concerned.

Cordially yours,
THOMAS KIRBY,
National Legislative Chairman.

I want to thank Mr. Harry C. Butcher and the other officials of the Columbia Broadcasting System for the privilege of making these remarks over the air.

I shall be glad to send to anyone requesting it a copy of a speech which covers every phase of this subject, answers every argument against the proposal, and discloses the number of veterans in each State holding adjusted-service certificates and the amount that will be paid these veterans if H. R. 1 passes Congress. You may address your request to Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

APPALACHIAN ELECTRIC POWER CO. v. GEORGE OTIS SMITH

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 930, limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code with respect to counsel in the case of the Appalachian Power Co against George Otis Smith and consider same.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That nothing in sections 109 and 113 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, as amended (U. S. C., title 18, secs. 198 and 203), or of any other act of Congress forbidding any person in the employ of the United States or acting in any official capacity under them from acting as agent or attorney for another before any department or branch of the Government or from receiving pay for so acting shall be deemed to apply to counsel serving in the case of the Appalachian Electric Power Co. v. George Otis Smith et al., now pending in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Virginia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from the Philippine Islands [Mr. OSIAS].

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, I wish at the outset to express my grateful appreciation for the uniform courtesy extended to me by the Members of the House of Representatives during my incumbency in office. I am thankful for the generosity of the majority floor leader in allotting me a few minutes to discuss in a preliminary way the Philippine question.

I shall do nothing more on this occasion than to present the true stand of the Filipino people in regard to our national freedom and apprise the membership of Congress of the subtle and widespread propaganda misrepresenting the real sentiment of my people and the declaration of the Filipino leaders.

Mr. Speaker, it is neither new nor strange to us that those opposed to the redemption of America's pledge to grant independence to the Philippines should labor to frustrate favorable action. We have long been the victims of a campaign of misinformation and misrepresentation. Time and again in the past accusations had been hurled against us. Our adversaries have alleged that the Filipinos do not really want independence; that only politicians are clamoring for it; and that the leaders must go through the gestures to keep themselves in power.

We have repeatedly denied these charges. We have answered that the fact that no Filipino may be elected to any office if he is not for independence is a proof of our universal devotion to our national emancipation. We have answered that all live elements of our population are convinced that independence is the best solution of the Philippine question. We have answered that the allegation that leaders have to advocate independence to keep themselves in power is really an argument in favor of independence, for it clearly reveals that the masses compel their leaders to take a firm stand.

At the extensive hearings on Philippine independence before the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, the insidious propaganda reached the members. We are indebted to the Senate committee for the categorical answer given. I quote the exact words of the majority report:

It is insinuated that the Philippine people do not actually desire independence and that their leaders do not really favor it, and yet, in reply to this propaganda, there comes from the entire press of the Philippines, from all classes of its population, from its school children and its public officials, from the representatives of its political parties, majority and minority, a demand for independence.

Not a single witness before your committee could name 10 Filipinos who do not favor independence. The business organizations of the islands, their national conferences, their educators, their government officials, their economists have all declared for independence. The Philippine press, the Philippine public, the Philippine pulpit, the Philippine school, and Philippine industries seem, so far as we can ascertain, to be unanimous in the demand that the United States redeem its pledges to grant to these people the sovereignty to which they aspire.

In recent months a similar propaganda was renewed with greater intensity. Now it is blatantly announced to the four winds that the Filipinos have changed front. Right here in Washington there are individuals or agents interviewing Members of Congress and whispering that the Filipino leaders no longer want independence. They are distributing drafts of measures alleging that they embody the new stand of my people. I have in my possession a copy of such a measure kindly furnished me by a colleague. I also hold in my hands a printed pamphlet skillfully conveying the idea that a number of Filipino leaders no longer desire immediate independence and national sovereignty.

I stand here and say authoritatively that the allegation that we have changed front is false and unfounded. We employ no lobbyists—Filipino, foreigner, or American—to voice our desires. We speak for ourselves. The Philippine Legislature and the Filipino people are cognizant of the proper procedure in approaching the people and Government of the United States. Within a few days an independence mission sent at the behest of the Philippine Legislature will arrive in Washington. The members of this body and the American people at large are entitled to the truth, and the truth they shall have from the authorized and chosen spokesmen of my people. [Applause.]

I have the deepest respect for the Congress of the United States, and I wish to say without fear of successful contradiction that if the Members could visit the Philippines they would see for themselves that the Filipino people's demand for independence to-day is more vocal and insistent. Speaker Roxas, who headed the last mission that appeared before congressional committees during the last Congress, voiced our true sentiments when he pleaded for the immediate, absolute, and complete independence of the Philippines. Senator Osmeña, speaking at the last session of the Philippine Legislature, stated what the Filipinos most desire, in these words:

What our people want now is their independence; that they be allowed to live their own free life, direct their own destinies, and establish, finally, a government of their own, loved and sustained by themselves under the ægis of their own flag.

Senate President Quezon, whose views had been garbled in transmission and very seriously misrepresented in the American press, defined the relations that the Philippines should have with America when he submitted his report to the legislature. No one who knows the patriotic and self-sacrificing spirit of our national leader in our emancipatory struggles extending over a period of years, no one who had ever come in contact with him while in Congress could ever doubt that he is now, as he has always been, for independence. The report alluded to closes with this paragraph:

Our relations with the American people * * * must be inspired by the principle of self-determination and voluntary partnership. It is only thus that an effective and cordial cooperation between America and the Philippines may be secured in a common design to promote the moral and material interests of both peoples.

The last independence congress held in Manila attended by representative elements of our population adopted the following self-explanatory resolution:

In the name and in behalf of the Filipino people we solemnly affirm, with full realization of the consequences and responsibilities of political independence, that our people should be allowed to live an independent life and to establish a government of their own without any further delay and without any condition which makes its advent uncertain; hence we respectfully reiterate our petition to the people and Government of the United States to grant the Philippines immediate, complete, and absolute independence.

At the last session of our insular legislature an independence memorial was approved at a joint session, and I take the liberty of reading the closing paragraph:

The independence of America from the Philippines would seem to be as imperative as the independence of the Philippines from America. Therefore, with all due respects, with a deep feeling of gratitude to America, and with full consciousness of the burdens and responsibilities of an independent life, we hereby submit that the time has come for the redemption of America's solemn promise to declare and recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. Speaker, no one who hears or reads these pronouncements can honestly say that the Filipino people are not sincerely devoted to their independence. Every mail from across the seas brings to my office resolutions from provincial boards and municipal councils voicing the same sentiment. I submit that the members of this body are witnesses to my constant plea for immediate, absolute, and complete independence.

An impartial observer, Mr. Eddy, in a volume on the Challenge of the East, recently published, and devoting a chapter to the Philippines, does not hesitate in saying:

> We have found no people in the world so unitedly, so passionately, so insistently desiring independence as the Filipinos.

The SPEAKER. The time of the Commissioner from the Philippines has expired.

Mr. OSIAS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman take all the time he wants. We would like to hear the subject discussed.

Mr. KNUTSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent was granted that there would be 20 minutes of debate on a side, to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from the Philippines.

Mr. OSIAS. I thank the gentlemen most heartily. Mr. Speaker, in two minutes it is clearly impossible adequately to discuss other phases of this all-important problem, independence, but the extension of time enables me to present succinctly our independence stand. In words as plain and in language as clear as I can make it, this is the stand of my people to-day: If given the choice between a continuation of the present form of government on the one hand and immediate, absolute, and complete independence, with all the attendant consequences on the other, the Filipino people are a unit in favor of immediate, absolute, and complete independence. To make this point more emphatic: If the choice is between relative prosperity without freedom on the one hand and independence with relative poverty on the other, my people would unhesitatingly choose the latter. Naturally, if they could secure immediate independence with reasonable economic adjustment, they would welcome it. But let there be no mistake. The supreme concern of the Filipinos is the early grant of national independence. [Applause.]

I am inspired, Mr. Speaker, that during this brief session of the Seventy-second Congress already the membership has shown itself liberal and generous even to countries across the Atlantic, even to people who were once the enemy of the United States. I speak for a people, who during that world cataclysm, clung to you with a loyalty that bordered on filial affection. They, through my weak voice, appeal to you that you cast your eyes upon those distant isles and attend with equal sympathy and promptness to our needs.

The last important legislation for the Philippines was approved in August, 1916. For a decade and a half Congress has enacted no fundamental law that would remove the uncertainty and anomaly of the Philippine situation or which would forever solve the relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands.

There should be no further moratorium on the Philippine question. There should no longer be a holiday on a problem involving people's rights and human freedom. Let American statesmanship now assert itself and grant us the independence which has been promised, and forestall even the possibility of bankruptcy in American-Filipino relationship. [Applause.]

The independence resolution approved on September 24, 1931, at a joint session of the Philippine Legislature, unanimous consent for the inclusion of which was secured, follows:

INDEPENDENCE RESOLUTION APPROVED SEPTEMBER 24, 1931, AT A JOINT SESSION OF THE PHILIPPINE LEGISLATURE

We, the members of the Philippine Legislature, in joint session assembled, for ourselves and in behalf of the Filipino people do hereby reiterate our petition for the immediate and complete political separation of the Philippine Islands from the United States. Our desire for liberty was repeatedly manifested in the course of our history throughout our many struggles for political emancipation culminating in the establishment of the Philippine Republic. We lost our independence because of the superior force of America. We expect to regain it because of her plighted word.

We acquiesced in American rule only when we were assured that she came not as a conqueror but as a liberator. In all good faith we relied on her promise made through her highest executive officials and confirmed by the Congress of the United States when it declared that the independence of the Philippine Islands shall be granted upon the establishment of a stable government. This condition having been fulfilled, the Filipino people rightfully expect that their independence will be recognized without any further delay.

Practical considerations also justify this urgent desire for immediate separation. The present movement to exclude Filipinos from the United States is giving rise to friction and misunderstanding. The manner in which the campaign is being conducted can not but arouse among the Filipino people a feeling that it is impelled by other than purely economic motives. Then, at the present time it is not safe for Filipinos in some parts of the United States to engage in lawful occupations. So long as we remain under the American flag, justice demands that we shall be allowed to live, work, and travel freely in any American territory.

The dual responsibility in our Government, the one assumed by the governor general and the other by Filipino officials, has been the source of serious conflicts in the past and is ever fraught with difficulties. Such an unsatisfactory situation must end. A backward step is unthinkable. The only solution is independence.

Our present trade relations with the United States are uncertain and unstable. Regulated exclusively by the American Congress, America's interests rather than our own are the dominant consideration. There is an increasing demand by American producers to maintain the American market solely for their benefit. Powerful American interests are now conducting a persistent campaign against the free entry of Philippine products. No one knows how long the American market will remain open to us. Doubts and misgivings have seized upon the minds of Philippine producers and investors, thus checking our development. We believe that enduring economic progress can only be achieved under an independent Philippines, free to dictate its own policies.

These facts prove the wisdom of the declared purpose of the United States to grant us independence. They also serve to strengthen our belief that political separation is the only solution to our problem. We see no other alternative. The happiness and prosperity of the Philippines and the economic interests of America are not to be found in the present artificitl union which hampers our national development and injures economic progress, but in political separation wherein each may live the life suited to its distinct individuality and its national interests.

The independence of America from the Philippines would seem to be as imperative as the independence of the Philippines from America. Therefore, with all due respect, with a deep feeling of gratitude to America, and with full consciousness of the burdens and responsibilities of an independent life, we hereby submit that the time has come for the redemption of America's solemn promise to declare and recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a resolution commending a bill that I have introduced in regard to the communists.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the resolution about?

Mr. HOPKINS. It is a resolution approving a speech that I made in regard to communism and the bill that I have introduced, which has been referred to the Committee on Naturalization and Immigration, in regard to excluding communists from this country.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, for the time being I shall object.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 13 minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I may be forced to use more than 13 minutes and I would like to know now before I start whether I can or not. I ask unanimous consent that I may have 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that he may address the House for 20 minutes, regardless of the unanimous-consent agreement entered into by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from New York. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, during the discussion of the moratorium resolution I discussed briefly a proposition for the rehabilitation of finance in this country. I referred to the fact that it would have to be handled by a board or commission, and I questioned the policy of allowing the President of the United States to name that whole commission. I did so upon the ground that he had not been particularly successful in the commissions which he had named, and adverted to the fact that the Farm Board was one of the shocking instances of a commission that had not been popular in the execution of its trust. Yesterday the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] took me to task, and while I was not here, which was all right, he made quite a lengthy discussion and inserted a great deal in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in reference to that matter. He conceived that I had devoted a great deal of time to assailing the Farm Board. Two short paragraphs were all I used about it, but it seemed to have touched a tender spot somewhere, because it took from 30 to 40 pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to reply to it. I shall have something to say about some of the things said.

He undertakes to say who the board are, and he first names Mr. Teague, who came from California. I did not mention Mr. Teague, but he was a member of the board, and his principal business is growing lemons, oranges, and walnuts. I knew we had a lemon, and I said in my speech that there were nuts on the board, and I am satisfied that the gentleman from California was one of those who participated in handing us a lemon and that he was one of the nuts.

The next gentleman they talked about is Mr. Legge. My friend twits me because Mr. Legge was appointed on a commission once before by President Wilson. Now, that does raise a presumption that he had sense enough to be on this board, but it is not a presumption that is not rebuttable, and when he says the only thing for the cotton farmers to do when they are about to make a good crop is to plow up one-third of that crop I say that presumption is rebutted. The gentleman overlooked the fact that President Wilson also appointed Mr. Hoover, now the President of the United States, to a position of equal dignity to that of Mr. Legge, and yet I am questioning Mr. Hoover's capacity to name boards to handle these great financial transactions, and I am in favor of some limitation upon these things aside from that provided in the Constitution.

Then the gentleman speaks of Mr. McKelvie, to whom I referred as being a newspaper man and not a farmer, and that he had not raised any wheat. Mr. McKelvie replies to his inquiry in a very long telegram and says:

> We have produced wheat on our Nebraska farms for 50 years, and now have a thousand bushels of wheat in the bin on our farms near Lincoln.

Who is "we"? Has this gentleman become so exalted that he has to be spoken of in the plural number? Gentlemen, if he tells the truth, he is an abnormal man. He saw the light of day cutting wheat. I call attention to the fact that the gentleman has only been born 50 years. Certainly in Nebraska they do not begin to raise wheat the moment they begin to raise "cain" when they have the colic, and therefore I say that "we," Mr. McKelvie, who writes this telegram, certainly is not the fellow who was making wheat, because he could not make it 50 years ago.

What did he say in Who's Who? We all know who prepares Who's Who. The fellow writes his own biography. He says he was born on the 15th of April, 1881; married June 19, 1904; with the Bee Publishing Co., Omaha, Nebr. Is that where he was raising wheat—with the Bee Publishing Co. in 1902 to 1905? Became editor Nebraska Farmer in 1905; principal owner and publisher, 1908; now president; member, city council, Lincoln, 1908–9. Member, Nebraska House of Representatives, 1911–1913; lieutenant governor, 1913–1915. Governor Nebraska, 1919–1923. Appointed member Federal Farm Board, 1929. Republican; Methodist; Mason; Odd Fellow; Elk; Commercial Club of Lincoln; Chicago Athletic Club; Hamilton Club.

That is the record.

Now, where does the wheat appear? Where does Mr. McKelvie even himself assert that he was ever a farmer raising any wheat? A promoter, as I shall show before I get through here.

Now, let us see what this great board has done. It is a great board, or should be. It has most remarkable powers and has been endowed with the most remarkable amount of money that any board has ever been given. He says they loaned $5,000,000 to the cooperatives of South Carolina. Five million out of five hundred million. That is true. I thank them for it. I will say they have loaned it to a deserving institution. As far as the cotton cooperative in South Carolina is concerned it is now a well-regulated, well-managed concern, in which the people of the State have confidence. I am thoroughly acquainted with it. I have my 1930 cotton crop with them to-day, which I put there on the advice of the gentlemen who constitute this board; that cotton was too low and it was foolish to sell it. That is what Legge said. That is all right. I voted for the law and am not attacking it, but I have the right to criticize the administration of it.

They have loaned some to the tobacco cooperative, which has gone out of business. I am sorry it has. Now, let us see what else they did. They employed a gentleman by the name of Creekmore. I do not know where he came from, but they employed him at a salary of $75,000 a year to manage the cotton business; the same salary that the President of the United States draws. They employed him and authorized him to employ help, and they fixed their salaries. This man fixed them all except his own, and they run from $35,000 down, and there are many of them. Just glance at these hearings before the committee. In the cotton cooperatives there are eight pages of names, and nobody gets less than a hundred dollars a month and many of them get $1,250 and $1,500 a month. That is a most remarkable salary list and there are eight pages of that.

Then they employed a Mr. Milnor to manage the wheat business and they pay him $50,000 a year.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I can not yield. My time is limited. They pay Mr. Milnor $50,000 a year and they pay several of his underlings over $30,000 a year. It would not do to put them all in one place, so they established two corporations, the Grain Stabilization Corporation and the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, I believe, is the name of the other. Both of them are controlled by the Federal Farm Board. They have a list of officers, and the president of the National Farm Grain Association gets $15,000 a year. This man Milnor controls both of them. The salary list of the one runs from page 201 to page 204 of these printed hearings, a closely printed list of three pages. The Members of this House should each have a copy of these hearings before the Senate, and they will find what a tremendous lot of statesmen we have who are worth a lot more money than the ordinary business man.

Then from pages 216 to 235 there are 19 pages of closely printed names of people who are holding jobs under this great Mr. Milnor and his coordinates—no; he has no coordinates; he is the biggest man in the world outside of the board. The board has given those two men, one of them to manage the cotton and the other to manage the wheat, $125,000 a year. That is $50,000 more than the President of the United States gets. So that when we look at the beginning of it we might imagine we will come out the little end of the horn. Let us see about it.

The stock of grain now on hand. In this volume in their report which they have made to the Government, and which, by the way——

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. I would like to get some information. Who hires these men? The board or the cooperatives?

Mr. STEVENSON. The board hires them. The board hires the head man and he hires the balance.

Mr. REED of New York. For instance, take the man at the head of the cotton cooperative. I know nothing about the cotton business, but does the board pay him?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; the board pays him through its agencies, the two corporations it finances, one of which it owns absolutely. He hires the help and those agencies pay them.

Mr. REED of New York. I do not care to differ with the gentleman, because undoubtedly he has looked it up, but it is my impression that the board simply suggests certain men who are capable of handling the business, and if they meet the approval of the cooperatives they engage the men and pay the salaries.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will show the gentleman where he is wrong. [Reads from the hearings before Senate committee, p. 290:]

The CHAIRMAN. Well, all that you control. You are occupying the postion of a general manager of one institution and vice president and general manager of the other. You control a quantity of cotton. What do you propose to do with it; and how much money have you borrowed on it? How much have you sold? What is the present situation?

Mr. CREEKMORE. The Cotton Stabilization Corporation is a Delaware corporation consisting of memberships purchased at a nominal price by the various State cooperative associations. It is financed entirely by the Federal Farm Board. It has a board of directors, but the policies of the Cotton Stabilization Corporation, general policies, are directed by the Federal Farm Board. The money we have invested in the Cotton Stabilization Corporation has been received entirely from the Federal Farm Board or borrowed from commercial banks.

Mr. REED of New York. The point I am making is this—and all I want is information—that certain managers are selected to handle these cooperatives and that these salaried men are really the employees of the cooperatives.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is not the testimony, and I will just cut the gentleman off now. I hate to be brusque, but that is not the evidence, as the gentleman will find if he examines the hearings before the Senate committee.

Mr. REED of New York. I did not mean to interrupt the gentleman, but I simply wanted accurate information.

Mr. STEVENSON. The accurate information is that all of these people have testified that the Farm Board names the two headmen and they name the balance, and the Farm Board pays all of them through their agencies.

Mr. HOPKINS. As a loan.

Mr. STEVENSON. As a loan nothing. They pay them out of the funds.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will yield one more time.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman just read from the testimony given before the Senate committee a statement relative to the Cotton Stabilization Corporation which I am afraid the gentleman is confusing with the cotton cooperative associations.

Mr. STEVENSON. No. I have more cotton than McKelvie ever had wheat. I know all about that.

Mr. HOPE. I think if the gentleman will read that more carefully he will find I am correct.

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, I have read it sufficiently carefully to know that I am correct. I will read further from the hearings before the Senate committee (reads from p. 324):

Senator GORE. I say, didn't your cooperatives take over cotton from the Oklahoma cooperatives, paying them 5 cents a pound more than it was worth at the time? In other words, didn't you advance to them 16.34 cents a pound when it was selling around 11 and 12 cents a pound in the market?

Mr. CREEKMORE. Well, I don't believe there was that much difference at any time; but it is admitted that at the time the Cotton Stabilization Corporation took the cotton over from the Oklahoma association it took it over at a materially higher price than existed at the time.

Senator GORE. Now, do you know why that was done?

I want you to notice where the reasons came from.

Senator GORE. I have heard so much talk about it that I should like to know why it was done.

Mr. CREEKMORE. I can give you my reason; but the Federal Farm Board and I have not yet agreed on the exact reason.

They have not yet agreed on the reason, and that is another evidence of the incompetency of the Federal Farm Board. Here a year after the thing was done, which cost the Farm Board millions of dollars, the Federal Farm Board and its agent have not agreed on what excuse they will offer.

They have had nearly a year and yet they have not been able to agree on the same reason, and that is merely an instance I wanted to call to your attention of the inefficiency of the whole set-up.

Now, gentlemen, what do they carry in their assets and liabilities? We find that the Farm Board claims that they have $118,700,000 invested in cotton.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. I just talked with the Federal Farm Board and the gentleman is mistaken. The managers to whom the gentleman has been referring, with the possible exception of one or two, are employed by the cooperatives and paid by them.

Mr. STEVENSON. But it comes out of the funds of the Federal Farm Board.

But the gentleman from New York asserts that the board has nothing to do with these salaries. Let us see what Mr. Stone, of the board, says about it. In reference to Milnor, Senate hearings, pages 21 and 22:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Milnor is in charge of the stabilization activities, is he not?

Mr. STONE. He is in charge of the Stabilization Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. Inasmuch as the Farm Board supplies the funds and is responsible for the management of that corporation, as you have described, you have fixed the salaries of those associated with Mr. Milnor, have you not?

Mr. STONE. We have been consulted about salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. What salary does Mr. Milnor receive?

Also pages 26 and 27 of Senate hearings:

Senator CAPPER. I want to hear something about that salary of $50,000 a year. How does the Federal Farm Board justify such a salary?

Mr. STONE. In this way, Senator CAPPER: In the beginning, when the Stabilization Corporation was organized, the board was very anxious to get the very best grain man we could to operate it. We found it was a very difficult thing to do. There were several men we had in mind but they turned it down. And we came to the conclusion that for a man who had the capacity and the ability to handle an operation involving possibly hundreds of millions of dollars, it was not so much a question of salary as a question of ability and honesty and integrity. And with a business of that magnitude a salary of that kind is not out of line in industrial operations.

So the board does select the grain man, and the evidence is conclusive that they furnish the money with which the business is conducted by both the Stabilization Corporation and the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, and if these corporations pay the exorbitant salaries they will have the greater deficit to report to the board, and the loss falls directly at last on the revolving fund.

Again, on page 50 and 51 of the hearings, we find the following statement:

Senator GORE. Mr. Stone, when you selected Mr. Milnor as the head of the Stabilization Corporation I believe you said you were more concerned about the matter of ability than salary.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Senator GORE. Did the Federal Farm Board select Mr. Milnor as the manager of the Stabilization Corporation?

Mr. STONE. They approved his selection.

Senator GORE. Who made the selection in fact?

Mr. STONE. As far as the Stabilization Corporation was concerned, I think the Federal Farm Board selected him. But Mr. Legge was the chairman then.

Senator GORE. What compensation did he get?

Mr. STONE. He got at that time from the Stabilization Corporation, I think, $36,000. But Mr. Milnor can give you all of the details about that.

Senator GORE. I understand; but I want to ask you a few questions along that line. Then he was paid an additional sum from the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, I believe?

Mr. STONE. Yes; by the Farmers' National Grain Corporation.

Senator GORE. An aggregate of $50,000?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Senator GORE. When you came to approve his selection you made no inquiry as to his talents or services, did you?

Mr. STONE. Yes. He was very highly recommended to us by the vice president of one of the largest banking institutions in St. Louis, who is probably one of the ablest grain men in the country.

But they say the Farmers' National Grain Corporation is an independent concern. Hear the facts—page 52 of the hearings:

Senator WHEELER. And the people who furnish the money to the Farmers' National Grain Corporation are whom, for instance? Is that the Federal Farm Board?

Mr. STONE. Largely, I might say.

Senator WHEELER. Not only that, but the Federal Farm Board has likewise loaned to its members large sums of money, to organizations like the Farmers' Union?

Mr. STONE. No; we have only loaned money through the Farmers' National Grain Corporation.

So the Farmers' National Grain Corporation is the agent of the board to loan money, but it gets "largely" all its money from the board, and it is now claimed to be paying Milnor the $50,000. Either this is coming out of the revolving fund of the board, directly or indirectly, or it is coming out of the farmers whose wheat they handle with the board's approval, for they approve Milnor and his salary, and could shut him off any minute by stopping loans to their agent. In either event they are failing in their duty.

Again they have been speculating in wheat futures, and this Farmers' National Grain Corporation is their agent to buy and sell. See page 262 of the hearings, where it is admitted that the Farmers' National Grain Corporation charged the Stabilization Corporation $471,000 commissions for handling its future contracts, and bragged that it made in the period $2,418,300.32. See page 261:

Senator GORE. Now, during that time the Stabilization Corporation lost $110,000,000.

Mr. MILNOR. Quite right.

Senator GORE. And these corporations are Siamese twins, aren't they?

Mr. MILNOR. No sir.

Senator GORE. You are president and general manager of the Grain Stabilization Corporation, are you not?

Mr. MILNOR. That is right.

Senator GORE. And you are the vice president and general manager of the Farmers' National Grain Corporation?

Mr. MILOR. That is quite right.

Senator GORE. That is a pretty strong ligament, is it not?

Now, these two corporations were practically owned by the board. No capital had been paid into the stock of the grain stabilization except what the board furnished. Farmers' National had received $76,000—page 262 of hearings—in cash capital from cooperatives and borrowed $38,000,000 from the board. The salary of the manager is $50,000. Eighteen months would take the entire private capital, yet it is so managed that it makes two and one-half millions and the board-owned corporation loses $110,000,000, and they say the board, who selected the manager and approved his salary, is not responsible for the slice which he gets and the Government does not lose it.

Cotton was handled the same way. A cotton stabilization corporation was absolutely controlled by the Farm Board. They were consulted before Creekmore was employed (p. 288, hearings). The American Cotton Association was the other corporation in the deal. It had a capital stock paid in of $79,500 (p. 289, hearings), and Creekmore's salary was $75,000. The Farm Board pays half that salary directly through the Stabilization Corporation and indirectly all of it in its loses. On pages 290 and 291, hearings, we find the following:

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Federal Farm Board, that is, the Stabilization Corporation as its agent, contribute the $25,000, or is it also sharing in the 5 cents a bale up to the 1,000,000 bales?

Mr. CREEKMORE. It would share the 5 cents a bale up to 1,000,000 bales.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it is a 50-50 proposition with respect to your salary?

Mr. CREEKMORE. It worked out the past year as one-third for the Cotton Stabilization and two-thirds for the American Cotton Cooperative Association. I think perhaps the percentage was a little higher than that.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the cooperative association.

Mr. CREEKMORE. Yes. American Cotton Cooperative Association.

The CHAIRMAN. Of which you are vice president and general manager. What are you attempting to do with your holdings at this time?

Mr. CREEKMORE. With the 2,000,000 or 1,700,000 bales.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, all that you control. You are occupying the position of a general manager of one institution and vice president and general manager of the other. You control a quantity of cotton. What do you propose to do with it and how much money have you borrowed on it? How much have you sold? What is the present situation?

Mr. CREEKMORE. The Cotton Stabilization Corporation is a Delaware corporation consisting of memberships purchased at a nominal price by the various State corporative associations. It is financed entirely by the Federal Farm Board. It has a board of directors, but the policies of the Cotton Stabilization Corporation, general policies, are directed by the Federal Farm Board. The money we have invested in the Cotton Stabilization Corporation has been received entirely from the Federal Farm Board or borrowed from commercial banks.

Now, how were the salaries paid? Hear Mr. Creekmore (p. 302):

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you get the money, then, to pay the salaries of these employees if your venture was a losing one?

Mr. CREEKMORE. Under the arrangement we made with the Federal Farm Board last year they agreed to finance the American Cotton Cooperative Association if we would make this 90 per cent loan.

Senator WHEELER. What is the aggregate monthly salary of your organization, the A. C. C. A., as you call it?

Mr. CREEKMORE. The average?

Senator WHEELER. The aggregate.

Mr. CREEKMORE. The aggregate—roughly, I would estimate it to be around $70,000 a month.

Senator SHIPSTEAD. $70,000 a month?

Mr. CREEKMORE. Correct.

Senator SHIPSTEAD. That would be a million dollars a year?

Mr. CREEKMORE. Very nearly.

So while they have attempted to camouflage the salary business by mixing it up in two corporations, it was all laid on the doorstep of the Farm Board, who selected the two managers with their enormous salaries, and they in turn selected the other employees and fixed their salaries, and ultimately the Treasury must bear the burden.

Mr. REED of New York. Oh, no; it does not. All that the board can do is recommend.

Mr. YON. Does not the Federal Farm Board provide the money for these stabilization corporations?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. I have talked with them direct.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now, gentlemen will see when they look at the hearings that the investment in cotton reported by the Farm Board is $118,000,000; that they have 1,310,789 bales of cotton at 6 cents, worth $39,000,000, and leaving a loss of $79,000,000 in to-day's market; but Mr. Creekmore does not make that same report. Mr. Creekmore reports more indebtedness. If you will refer to Creekmore's report, which is in the hearings, you will find that Mr. Creekmore reports they have $193,000,000 invested in it instead of $118,000,000.

To give the gentleman information as to what the Federal Farm Board regards the situation to be, the Grain Stabilization Corporation also owes commercial banks and intermediate credit banks $83,000,000, in addition to these obligations, and further offsetting its assets of 257,000,000 bushels of wheat. The total invested in wheat stabilization on June 30, 1931, was, therefore, $248,076,253.57. Final cost of the operation will not be known until the sale of the 257,000,000 bushels of wheat.

This is what the Farm Board says in its own report, and this is the amount that I charge they have invested, and this is the amount that Mr. Milnor represents.

Oh, they want to shift it now to the cooperatives. Who are the cooperatives that are getting all this money? They are the ones created by the Federal Farm Board, and, as the testimony here shows, they are controlled by it. Mr. Creekmore and Mr. Milnor both admit that these matters are all controlled by the Federal Farm Board and that ultimately the expenses come out of the Federal Farm Board, because the cooperatives can not live with this kind of proposition.

Now, gentlemen, I have one or two other things I desire to advert to.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. For the special delight of most Nebraskans I would like to ask the gentleman to inject just a little more embalming fluid into the Farm Board corpse of McKelvie. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. I will proceed to that situation. Mr. McKelvie I have already referred to. Mr. McKelvie was a promoter, and in his statement here he says he is not a member and has not been a member of any cooperative association. Let us get at that:

"I never have had any official connection with any cooperative, but have had membership in one," and so on, and so on.

Now, let us stop a minute and see. We find Mr. McKelvie's activities very largely distributed. I do not usually read these books that are sent around to everybody, but when a man sets out a facsimile of what he is talking about, then I think there is something to it. Mr. McKelvie says he has never been an officer in any cooperative. Let us see about that.

If you will get Wheat and Politics, by one Brinton, whom McKelvie introduced here at Washington in very florid terms, as I will show by this book if anybody questions it, you will find with respect to the Nebraska wheat-pool organization headquarters "J. W. Brinton, organization director; Philip W. Bross, campaign manager; Sam R. McKelvie, chairman of advisory committee."

Then we have another "Midwest Grain Marketing Association," which was the other name of the Nebraska wheat pool, "Ernest Peterson, president; L. S. Hurst, secretary; O. M. Smith, general manager; Sam R. McKelvie, chairman advisory committee; A. P. Sprague, legal counsel; T. M. McIlwraith, organization director."

This was the Midwest Grain Marketing Corporation. So he was an officer in it, and not only that, but in organizing it they organized a wheat-finance corporation of $50,000 with which to get the money to pay the expenses of the organization, and they carried out their contract so miserably that they got $50,000 of notes from the farmers of Nebraska, and when they began to collect them they had fallen down on their contract absolutely. They, the farmers, went into court, and you will find set out there the complaint in which McKelvie, as one of the defendants, is one of the officers mentioned in the complaint, and the court of Nebraska held that it was a fraud committed on the farmers and enjoined the collection of the notes by the finance corporation. This is what happened to Mr. McKelvie in this particular instance.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. For just a minute.

Mr. LOZIER. May I say, in support of the gentleman's statement, that the book he has, Wheat and Politics, shows the type of men the Federal Farm Board has placed in charge of the stabilization activities of the Union.

Mr. STEVENSON. I commend it to the honest consideration of anybody here.

While Mr. McKelvie was running his newspaper he ran a farmers' protective association, whereby, I believe, for a fee of $2, he let them join his protective association and gave them a little tag to put up in the front yard to keep out crooks and slickers. You know they call him Slippery Sam out there. Here is the thing that was given to the members of the farmers' protective association, a little brass card to put up in your front yard so that any crook will run away when he sees it.

Now, some of the farmers that went into the McKelvie wheat pool were not satisfied and complained; but that was appealing from Philip drunk to Philip sober.

Now, there is one thing further. The Farm Board loaned a lot of money over McKelvie's signature. Listen to this:

FEDERAL FARM BOARD,
Washington, D. C., October 16, 1929.

Mr. OTIS M. SMITH,
General Manager Midwestern Grain Marketing Association, Lincoln, Nebr.

MY DEAR OTIS: Your application for a supplemental loan was received Monday and approved Tuesday. By this time our secretary, no doubt, has advised you how to proceed to get the money without delay.

I will be in Lincoln Saturday of this week and hope to see you then.

Very truly yours,

SAMUEL R. MCKELVIE,
Member, Federal Farm Board.

(Mr. STEVENSON reads further from Wheat and Politics:)

As pointed out in a letter reproduced elsewhere, some of these farmers considered the 60 cents per bushel which they received for wheat as against an average "farm price" of $1.07—a difference of 47 cents per bushel—a sufficient reason for calling upon the McKelvie "protective" organization to protect them. In this letter the "protective" bureau manager appealed to the McKelvie wheat-pool attorney, and recited that a farmer had received only 60 cents per bushel on 2,000 bushels which he had delivered the previous year, and McKelvie's "protective agent" said they were receiving other "letters along this line." "This matter," said the McKelvie representative to the McKelvie attorney, "can not be staved off any longer. If it is, some action will be started in court."

Instead of McKelvie's protective bureau frankly telling its members who paid for the protective sign in their yards—and who rightly expected protection from the organization—the facts and giving them honest explanations, the agent of the "slippery one" concealed the facts to protect the politician from embarrassment and appealed to the attorney of Mr. McKelvie thus:

"Any suggestion you have to offer that will enable us to answer these people in a way that will explain the situation as satisfactorily as the circumstances will permit will be appreciated."

If that isn't a master plea in "confession and avoidance," we miss our guess.

This letter was written on July 25, 1929, when the McKelvie wheat pool was insolvent, when embezzlements and misappropriations had taken place within it, and when the facts were known to both McKelvie and his "protective agent," who is maintained in the McKelvie publication headquarters for the sole purpose—if that is the purpose of McKelvie's protective bureau—to give the McKelvie subscribers correct and true information and protect them from swindle and fraud.

Now, I am going to close what I have to say. It would take half a day to attend to this bunch.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I want five minutes more in order to read one more letter.

Mr. RAINEY. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now, I am going to appeal from the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] to a gentleman from Nebraska who lives in the district of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD]. This letter was published in the Republican, published at Central City, Nebr.:

I am a Federal Farm Board speculator. I trusted to their advice and lost. * * * As a farmer I had great confidence in the Federal Farm Board. I thought with $500,000,000 and unlimited power they would protect my interests. I was wrong. * * * I gambled on the Federal Farm Board by storing my grain.

I did not wish to crowd my wheat on the market against such advice. I stored it with one of the Federal Farm Board subsidiaries, the Westcentral Grain Co. They advanced me 45 cents for my wheat. In spite of their orderly marketing we heard so much about in the last few years and the promises of the Federal Farm Board, wheat continued to drop in price until the margin I was supposed to have was wiped out.

This is not a notice addressed to an old-time speculator on the board of trade, but to a greenhorn farmer—myself—who really thought the great and mighty Federal Farm Board was going to do my marketing wisely, in my name, for me. I am only one of thousands and thousands they have fooled. In fact, all who followed their advice are in the same unfortunate position. They got me in and then billed me (for $432.01). * * * Their letters demand the last pound of flesh. * * *

The Federal Farm Board subsidiaries have made their victims pay the price. Professing to be against speculating in grain, the Federal Farm Board advice has been nothing but gambling, with the farmers who listened paying the losses.

The minute a farmer stored his grain with a subsidiary of the Federal Farm Board his grain became subject to charges sufficient to pay a horde of employees and officials, as well as the inevitable cost of warehousing and keeping the product in condition. This, in the face of a down market, rather than the promised raise in price has wiped many a farmer from the picture where he had been a real Federal Farm Board speculator. * * *

AUG. J. WAGNER.
Central City, Nebr.

That is the story of the handling of things out there, and if the Federal Farm Board undertakes to establish an alibi by saying that all these fellows are employed by cooperatives, then I say that the testimony is that these cooperatives that constitute the Grain Stabilization Corporation are controlled by the Grain Stabilization Corporation, and that it is absolutely controlled by the Federal Farm Board, and it is so testified in these hearings, much of which I have set out. Therefore I submit with all deference that I have not done the gentlemen very much injustice by saying that they were incompetent to carry on the duties of their business, because they have lost, according to their own statement, $200,000,000 to $300,000,000, in round numbers, and, according to the statement of Mr. Creekmore, $50,000,000 more than that in their operations at stabilization, for which they and they alone are responsible. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that it be in order to move that the House stand in recess until such time to-day as the Speaker calls it together again, the bells to ring 15 minutes in advance of the call by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that it may be in order to move that the House shall stand in recess, subject to the call of the Speaker, with the understanding that the bells shall be rung 15 minutes prior thereto. The Chair is informed by the leader of the Senate, Senator WATSON, that they hope to be able to definitely state by 4.30 or 5 o'clock this afternoon whether or not the body will pass the concurrent resolution providing for an adjournment of the House and the Senate until January 4. As a result of that information the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] makes the request he has just announced. If the Senate does not pass the concurrent resolution, then it is the hope of the Chair that the House will give consent for the consideration and passage of a resolution, which the Clerk will report, when the House reconvenes after the recess.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That from and after this day the House shall meet only on Mondays and Thursdays of each week, until Monday, January 4, 1932.

The SPEAKER. The object of that resolution is that when we meet on Mondays and Thursdays the only thing in order would be a motion to adjourn, so that Members may go home with the assurance that nothing will be done in their absence. In case the Senate does not pass the concurrent resolution, the Chair believes it safe for Members to return to their homes with the assurance there will be no roll call or any business transacted before the 4th day of January.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the Speaker has made that explanation, because I think it should go out to the country so that Members may know what the situation is.

The SPEAKER. There is perfect cooperation between the majority leader and the minority leader in the matter. The Chair can not conceive of any situation that can arise where any business would be transacted. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, what the Speaker has reference to is that no business will be transacted in the House.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. McDUFFIE. However, several committees will function, as I understand.

The SPEAKER. The committees can work as much as they want to.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And will do so.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; that is a matter for the committees to determine for themselves.

GENERAL DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE, GENEVA

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed.

To the Congress of the United States:

In my message on foreign affairs which was communicated to the Congress on the 10th day of this month I spoke of the invitation which this Government has accepted to participate in the general disarmament conference which is to meet at Geneva on February 2, 1932. I spoke also in that message of the interest of this Government in supporting the efforts of this conference in accordance with the traditional policy of the American Nation to meet with the other nations of the world and to offer its cooperation in any endeavor which has in view the reduction of the huge burdens which result from unnecessarily heavy and costly armaments.

I am transmitting herewith and I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress a report on the subject from the Secretary of State, in which he requests that authorization be made for an appropriation to defray the expenses of sending an American delegation to Geneva for the purpose of representing the United States at the conference.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 22, 1931.

TOM SHINNERS

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by the insertion of the story of the man known as The Sunshine Man, Tom Shinners, who resides in my district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

RECESS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now stand in recess.

The motion was agreed to; and (accordingly at 1 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess, subject to the call of the Speaker.

AFTER RECESS

At the expiration of the recess the House was called to order by the Speaker at 11.01 o'clock p. m.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 147. Joint resolution to authorize the postponement of amounts payable to the United States from foreign governments during the fiscal year 1932, and their repayment over a 10-year period beginning July 1, 1933.

The message also announced that the Senate had concurred in House Concurrent Resolution No. 5, providing that when the two Houses adjourn on Tuesday, December 22, 1931, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian Monday, January 4, 1932.

THE STATE OF THE UNION

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. McKEOWN, was compelled to leave the city this afternoon and asked me to request unanimous consent that he might extend his remarks in the RECORD on the state of the Union, and I now make that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, for several days gentlemen here have debated the President's message on the state of the Union. In view of the fact that the state of the Union has improved so little since I last spoke on this subject in this House a year ago, I am constrained to again remind the country of the conditions as I see them.

What is the state of the Union?

A land of plenty and poverty.

A land of plutocrats and panics.

A land of big business and bankrupt merchants.

A land of inflated stocks and deflated buyers.

A land of trusts and combinations—chain stores and chained competition.

A land of gushing oil wells with importation of oil and its products increasing daily.

A land of the Federal reserve bank and home of breaking banks.

A land of natural water power controlled by trusts whose stocks are soaked with water.

A land where prohibition prevails and racketeers flourish.

A land blessed by Almighty God and dammed by bootleggers and the godless.

Where farmers fight in vain for a fair chance.

Where wheels of industry have stopped and laboring men wander up and down in search of work.

What has happened so suddenly to change in a decade a happy, prosperous, and contented people into a condition of misery, unrest, and chaos? There is but one answer—unwise and discriminatory laws.

This condition is not the result of "just happened so" or of any particular distressing occurrence. This condition has been long on the way and is the result of years of folly.

When the industrial sections of the Nation were not satisfied with reasonable tariff rates to protect their interests and wholly disregarded the fact that prosperity in America includes the far stretches of the West and South as well as the area of the manufacturing States, they obtained the enactment of the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act. This afforded the industrial areas a season of apparent prosperity. They apparently cared nothing for the distress of the agricultural group; and imbued with the prospects of world-wide denomination of trade, they closed their eyes and ears to the cry of distress from the South and the West.

This attitude of industry led Mr. Coolidge to proclaim in every speech and from the housetops that we were enjoying unparalleled prosperity. This was his platform in 1924.

Speculative citizens, after their run-to in Florida, turned to the greatest of all Monte Carlos, the stock market in Wall Street, and there commenced an amazing debacle. Every sane man knew it could not last.

Whether it be the duty of the White House to warn reckless citizens is not one made so by statute, but it remains that no warning was issued.

The panic in Wall Street can not be said to be responsible for our economic dilemma.

The money was not destroyed in any holocaust of fire or lost in some whim of nature.

In the early days after the war the manufacturers, having become more familiar with our European neighbors, began to prepare to furnish to Europe her needed supplies. Funds to buy with were needed. This was arranged through eager bankers who could exact luscious rates of interest.

The orders came in a deluge.

Manufacturers converted war industries into mass production of goods. To hold this trade, they set in to acquire and invent every possible labor-saving machine with which to reduce the costs of manufacturing and increase their profits.

The laborer and the farmer were left out of the picture. Whenever a labor-saving device was installed and 500 men thereby displaced, the wages of 500 men were saved; but, alas! the machine would not buy a pound of butter nor a yard of cloth.

They saved the cost of the labor of 500 men and likewise lost the buying power of 300 families.

While pandering to European trade, they kept the sales prices at war levels to the consuming public in America. Although by mass production the costs were lowered, yet the retail prices were not immediately cut. When business slackened, they made some reductions, but even to this hour the necessaries of life are above the price level of farm products. During the war period agriculture, driven on by the world's demands, expanded tremendously in spite of a dearth of farm labor and its greatly increased costs.

Upon the close of the war the farmers suffered more than their share in the deflation which immediately followed. In order to lower food prices in the great cities and industrial centers, the farmer was sacrificed on the altar of deflation.

He did not have in his pockets the needed money with which to absorb the shock. All America went on a spending orgy for a time, and we lost that element of saving and thrift for which our ancestors were noted.

How different has been the reaction from the World War as compared to the end of the War between the States. The soldiers of the North returned home to bend their efforts to restore their industries and broken fortunes. The followers of Lee went back to Dixie, a land of waste and ashes, to reconstruct a new and better South.

Saving, thrift, and work were magic talismans that brought this Republic to the forefront with the great nations of the earth. What of the state of the Union to-day? Gigantic surpluses of food products and manufactured wearing apparel, and thousands are hungry and nearly naked!

A land of boundless acres of land and thousands of homeless farmers and laborers with no place to lay their heads. A land of combination and centralization of wealth, where by one transaction you make one millionaire and a million poor. This is a situation brought about by unwise legislation fostered by the party in control of the Government. But to correct the situation calls for the best thought and votes of progressive Americans in both political parties.

The transportation question is here again. The railroads are to be consolidated. The whole rate structure should be revised.

What a situation do we often find in America—delicious fruits and food rotting in orchards or fields in one section and mouths hungry for them in other sections, wholly because of prohibitive freight rates.

The railroads complain that the United States Government is building highways and waterways out of the public fund for busses and boats to use in competition with their privately owned roads. They will not agree for Uncle Sam to run them, and do nothing to meet the competition.

There would be but few bus lines competing to-day had the railroads been willing to furnish shuttle trains and station-to-store delivery. On the other hand, if we do not regulate the tonnage, rates, and sizes of vehicles on highways, we will destroy both our railroads and highways.

The railroads, in a measure, are in the situation of the steamboats on inland waterways when railroads began to build. The Congresses of bygone days permitted the railroads over the outcry and protest of the river boats to parallel the rivers and destroy the steamboats.

We should profit by the errors of the past, and put an end to the constant fighting between transportation agencies, even if we go to the extent of fixing the classes of freight to be hauled by railroads, by busses, by barges, by pipe lines, and by air.

America needs all our methods of transportation, and it was an economic crime when we lost our river transportation.

The railroads are now clamoring for regulation of oil and gas rates by pipe lines.

Why did they not furnish equipment and fair rates to the oil people at the proper time and avoid the pipe-line competition?

America is suffering from high freight rates, and what we need most at this time is not consolidation, but freight classification and conservation of all our transportation methods.

Proscribe the sphere of the activities of each method, make them stop squabbling among themselves, and give the American people service.

The farming industry has been permitted to starve out and is to-day a quarter of a century behind industry in the matter of equipment and method.

We are not going to solve the difficulties of agriculture until we start at the root of the underlying trouble. As long as there are thousands of tenant farmers without land of their own or hope of a home; as long as the tenant farmer because of his dire extremities must pay excessive rates of interest for his supplies and exorbitant tariffs on his purchases; as long as his home and community conditions are such that the bright lights of the near-by towns and cities lure his sons and daughters away from home, so long will farming be a failure.

Cooperative marketing is good for big producers, but the little fellow will never get into the picture.

American business men want to do things on a big scale. Never satisfied to enjoy the better things of life, such as happiness and contentment, they seem to want to gather in a short span of life all the money in the world. Corporation farming and peasant farmers are in the offing. No individual farmer is financially able under present prices to equip his farm with necessary cost-cutting machinery. In Oklahoma, due under the constitution to the wisdom of its makers, corporation farming can not exist.

In view of the doctrine of isolation to which Republican leaders have committed our country in world affairs; first, by rejecting any affiliation with the other nations of the world, which action was approved by several millions of American voters who in an evil moment failed to foresee the commercial results; and second, by prohibitory tariff rates destructive to trade at home and commerce abroad. We shall now have to turn our attention, in so far as our industries are concerned, to the domestic markets.

Before you can stabilize agricultural products, you must assist the producers in controlling production. You apply control to the other industries, why not agriculture? [Applause.]

This is what must take place in America under the ill-advised and ill-constructed policies that have been inaugurated and put into force in the last 10 years in this country. You may as well make up your minds that you are going to confine all of your business activities to America alone, because, as I said a moment ago, in an evil moment there was a rejection of the association of nations that would have put us in touch with the foreign peoples and kept us in contact with them. But what have we done? In order to add insult to injury we refused to associate with them. We then passed the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act, which was the highest tariff that was ever passed. Then, in addition to that, we passed this monstrous Hawley-Smoot bill, which absolutely closed the markets for 26 nations of the world to our products.

Why do the cotton farmers of the South propose to raise cotton so that they can sell it abroad at less than it costs to produce it? Do your farmers of the South owe the manufacturers of England that much consideration that your women and your children shall toil in the fields in the hot days of summer to produce cotton and sell it to the manufacturers at less than it costs to produce it? Why do you not favor curtailing production of your cotton to meet domestic demands? Why do the wheat farmers of the West produce wheat and spend their time and energy to produce wheat to be sold to foreigners for less than it costs to produce it in America?

You can control overproduction. You control the production of manufactured articles. You control the production of oil, and yet there is importation of oil into this country every day that is overwhelming the oil business. You are going to destroy the American oil industry. You are going to give the foreign companies control of the American oil industry in this country within the next five years unless you change your policy. If we are going to have home markets, then the farm products must be controlled.

I have introduced a bill, for whatever it is worth, that sets out a plan by which the products of the farm can be controlled to meet domestic demands, and I can not understand why the farmers want to produce these articles and sell them at less than it costs to produce them.

Now, let me call your attention to something else. You may just as well make up your minds that you have either to pass an old-age pension bill in the Congress of the United States or you must close the Pension Office of the United States for 10 years on labor-saving devices. Where are you going to gain when you put a labor-saving device in by which you supplant thousands of men and not only lose both the labor of those men but the purchasing power of those men to buy your products?

One thing I am thankful for is that while my amendment to require one year's extension on all past-due installments due Federal land banks failed by a few votes, we have shown the temper of a large number of Congressmen on that vote, and I am advised that foreclosures will for a time cease.

It is hoped that Congress will at this session dispose of the soldiers' bonus matter at least to the extent of repealing the interest charges against the veterans on their loans.

My prayer for the state of the Union is a speedy return to prosperity.
